State looks to create cancer program

LAWRENCE (AP) — The University of Kansas is working on a plan that would use the resources of several areas of the university and regional hospitals to build a top-rated cancer program.

The goal of the effort, which could cost up to $350 million, is to obtain a federal designation as a comprehensive cancer center, which would make the university's medical center in Kansas City, Kan., and its Lawrence campus eligible for millions of dollars in federal funding and clinical trials on new cancer drugs.

The leader of the initiative is Roy Jensen, director of the Kansas Masonic Cancer Research Institute, which is the cancer research arm of the University of Kansas Medical Center.

Many parts of the university and hospitals around the state and region will be part of the effort, said Paul Carttar, the university's executive vice chancellor for external affairs.

Jensen said institute officials are looking for a deputy director for clinical affairs. Once that person is hired, the goal is to submit within two years an application for the federal designation.

If the effort succeeds, "people in this region would have access to the best cancer care available," Jensen said.

The university will face stiff competition for the federal designation. Jensen said the National Cancer Institute, an arm of the National Institute of Health, wants to develop five more cancer centers in the next five to seven years, meaning Kansas may compete with institutions such as the University of Miami, Stanford and Emory universities.
