Halloween has collectibles too

The displays of candy treats for Halloween are already appearing in the grocery stores even though that holiday is still six weeks away. In the last 10 years Halloween has become one of the major holidays for decorating and celebrating.

Fortunately, the emphasis is now on family fun and home or church parties rather than the malicious mischief and rowdy misbehavior that once made Oct. 31 an evening to dread.

Trick or treating in metropolitan areas has been spoiled by the warped tricks of a few spiteful people but it survives in small towns like ours with close. friendly neighborhoods.

Some of my favorite childhood memories center around going house to house in WaKeeney with my friends, sporting our homemade costumes, giggling and gathering treats that were often also homemade. Apples were a common offering and fresh cookies wrapped in wax paper. Sometimes you were given a glass of cider or a cup of cocoa. Not these days.

The pumpkin candy buckets we bought at the local dime store have become quite pricey lately. They were manufactured to be temporary containers and most were tossed away years ago.

Current high-value items are the German-made cardboard Jack 'O Lanterns that were made with a triangular nose cutout. German He was preceded in death by his construction from 1920, or thereabouts, is characterized by a cardpanding cardboard lantern with glue, printed blue eyes and crosshatched teeth in a big spooky grin.

Collector Chat Liza Deines

You'd grin, too, if you'd been bought for less than a nickel and were now worth $200 to $300, even in shabby condition. Americanmade candy buckets came from 1930-'40, and were usually larger, pressed in one hollow, ridged globe out of thick, composition cardboard like egg cartons. Similar in value, these fellows have applied glass eyes and the teeth in their big laughing mouths are almost always parted with a tongue showing.

Among Halloween collectibles are the small noisemakers that children used to create a din at the door when announcing their arrival. Called pan paddles, these were die-cut metal disks with small strikers on a flexible strip of metal. They could make a headsplitting racket when in the hands of enthusiastic little boys.

Both these and irritating wooden ratchet devices were made in Japan and sold very well in the 1930s. Celluloid "ogah" horns were expensive both then and now because they were so vulnerable to damage. Not too many survived and a lot of buyers are looking for them.

No one had "store-bought" costumes and few could purchase ances with great abandon. I wonmasks.

My father particularly vetoed the devil and skeleton masks so coveted by the boys of my age. And we didn't even suggest to him the wax vampire fangs or blackface disguises.

Few pretty masks were available, so we made our own tie on black eye masks and depended on raiding our older sisters' makeup and jewelry drawer for the rest.

I was a gypsy many times due to my sister's penchant for big flashy rings, dangly earrings and long strings of beads. A hand-me-down gathered skirt with a peasant blouse, a silk scarf tied around to hide my braids and you could cross my palm with silver for a peek into your future. One year my friend Sharon Ann and I, regally attired in every junky, jangly piece of jewelry we could lay hands on, actually did go out and tell fortunes. We predicted life lines, gloom and terror, imminent romances and huge inherit-der if any of it came true?

Vintage or not, skulls and witches, bats and cats, devils and demons are all collectible items and give a seasonal punch as decorations for a Halloween party.

Owls and pumpkins with autumn leaves and fall colors appeal more to me, however, for my family celebrates Oct. 31 as All Souls Day, the eve of All Hallows (All Saints Day), rather than the pagan devil's night. Either way, don't let your little goblins over-indulge from their candy haul and remind them, no mean tricks.

BETTER SAFE THAN SORRY: Carve a happy pumpkin smile to greet trick or treating guests and illuminate it with a flashlight instead of a candle. Your Jack 'O Lantern will be much safer and will last longer, too. And be sure to save, wash, salt and roast those pumpkin seeds for a tasty
