Collector says

Thanksgiving has always been a greatly anticipated holiday at our home because we have had the same special guests enjoying the festivities with us for many years.

When my oldest son was in kindergarten his teacher asked the class "What do we always have at Thanksgiving?" and David popped right up and replied, "Henleys!"

The teacher, anticipating a reply of turkey, said blankly "What's a henley?" When she told me about it later, she said she thought it must be something like a Cornish game hen. Actually, it was our guests last name Cornucopias are one of my favorite holiday collectibles because they are so versatile. Cascading with gourds, wee pumpkins, branches of bittersweet berries, sumac or Indian corn, they make a mantelpiece into a showpiece of autumn bounty. On a buffet try a glass or ceramic cornucopia to serve clusters of fresh grapes. Set it on a mirrored tray with apples, pears and plums mixed in with fancy cheeses and crackers and you have hors d'oevres, snacks or a light dessert alternative.

Heisey Glass, Cambridge Glass and Fostoria Glass all manufactured graceful crystal cornucopias that add a lot of sparkle to your Thanksgiving table. Some of us are fortunate enough to have one that's been in the family for years; others have to go searching for one but it is worth the trouble to find and store.

If you have space for a flower arrangement on that Thanksgiving table, take your cornucopia to a florist and ask if they will create an arrangement in it.

Frankoma Pottery produced an elegant cornucopia that was specifically meant for the floral trade. Their design, however, also works well as a salad bowl because it is tilted a bit more upright than most. Attractive ceramic cornucopias abound and can often be found at auctions for very reasonable prices.

Lightweight wicker cornucopias and those made of grapevines, woven of bamboo or rattan add a little rustic texture to a more casual home. Tiny wicker cornucopias at each table setting can serve both as like to choose which one to use each year.

Glass turkey top bowls are a collectible to which every adult child lays claim. A friend of mine is haunting auctions to find enough glass turkey bowls so each child can have one to forestall a fuss over who gets "the turkey dish". There are also some lovely old milk glass covered bowls in turkey shapes but they are becoming difficult to find.

Making holidays special for friends and family by way of traditional foods and guests is a joy and a pleasure. It's also fun to display some of those seasonal collectibles that have accumulated Pilgrim salt and pepper shakers, ceramic turkey napkin rings or candle holders, theme dishes all make your table festive without taking up space better saved for turkey and dressing or green bean casserole.

Use that tablecloth you've folded away, break out your best china and silver, fill those crystal goblets with wine and make sure that Thanksgiving means more to your family than just football.

COLLECTOR TIP: But, you say, where do I store all that stuff all year? We always wrapped ours up and kept it in the turkey roaster. Where else?
