What feels like the flu may be foodborne illness

Catching a cold or the flu several times in one season may seem ordinary. But what one thinks is a common cold or the flu could sometimes be a foodborne illness.

A lot of people mistake foodborne illness for flu because they have similar symptoms, including fever, upset stomach, vomiting, fatigue and nausea.

Foodborne illness can be caused by eating spoiled food, undercooking food, cross-contamination, or failing to wash hands.

Probably the most common food safety mistake people make is not taking care of leftovers properly. Other common mistakes include eating leftovers that have been stored too long, undercooking meat and failing to refrigerate groceries or leftovers quickly.

Be sure to wash hands, fruits, vegetables and dishes well. Many illnesses could be prevented this way, in addition to foodborne illnesses.

To minimize food safety risks, there are several tips:

- Wash hands before and after preparing food, eating, or touching family pets.

- Use a food thermometer to check whether meat is finished cooking. Ground beef needs to reach 160 degrees Fahrenheit; poultry, 180; fish, 145; pork, 160; and leftovers should be reheated to 165 degrees. Hot dogs should be steaming hot and eggs should be firm, not runny. Color should not be used to judge whether hamburgers are done because its color varies. One hamburger may be brown but not fully cooked, while another may be fully cooked but still pink.

- If a marinade is served it should only be used for one meal; throw it away afterward. When marinade is used a second time, it may have been contaminated by bacteria and blood from the meat. If marinade is to be used for basting, heat to boiling before brushing it on the meat.

- Cover and refrigerate leftovers within two hours of serving. Use leftovers within one to two days, wrap and freeze for another meal, or discard.

- Thaw meat in the refrigerator, not on the counter, to slow bacterial growth. If thawing meat in the microwave, continue cooking the meat as soon as it is thawed.

- Avoid cross-contamination by washing hands or utensils between touching raw and cooked foods.

Food safety can be achieved by remembering and practicing these four simple rules: first, keep hands, rags, surfaces and dishes clean; second, separate raw meats from cooked foods (including plates and utensils that have touched raw meats); third, cook foods to their proper temperatures; and fourth, chill foods as quickly as possible.
