Heat and humidity can cause serious health risks

In the summer, abundant sunshine and warmer temperatures have a way of luring people outdoors and making them more active than usual. Excessive heat and humidity can, however, pose health risks and should be taken seriously.

Home ed Tranda Watts, Extension specialist

In order to cool itself, the body releases perspiration, or sweat, which is then evaporated off the skin, releasing heat. High humidity levels slow the rate at which sweat will evaporate and prevent the body from releasing heat quickly. Heat exhaustion is a more mild form of heat-related illness and can sometimes take several days of exposure to high temperatures, or inadequate fluid intake to develop. People who are most prone to heat exhaustion are those with high blood pressure, those who work or exercise in high temperatures, the very young and the elderly. Young children are at risk because their body's heat regulatory system hasn't fully developed yet. Children may also not be able to recognize what is happening to them when they feel dehydrated or ill. Older adults are at risk because their heat regulatory systems may not function as well as it once did. Some warning signs of heat exhaustion include profuse sweating, a pale or grayish complexion, muscle cramps, fatigue, weakness, dizziness, headache, nausea or vomiting, and fainting. A person experiencing heat exhaustion may also have cool and moist skin; a fast, weak pulse rate; and quick, shallow breathing. If someone shows signs of heat exhaustion, get them out of the sun and into a cool or air-conditioned location. Lay the person down and elevate the legs and feet slightly. Cool the person down by spraying or sponging them with cool water. Let them drink cool water or a sports drink that contains electrolytes. Then, monitor the person to make sure he or she does not slip into a condition called heat stroke.

Heat exhaustion is a medical emergency and if untreated can cause serious injury or death. Call 911 if the person's temperature goes higher than 102 degrees Fahrenheit, or if fainting, confusion, or seizures occur. If you must work outdoors, try to work early in the morning, or in the evenings, and avoid sun exposure between 10 a.m. and 4 p.m., when the sun is at its hottest. It takes a couple of weeks for people to become acclimated to working in hot temperatures, so it's important to work at a gradual pace and don't push yourself too hard.
