This glass hard to find

Somehow this season of the year always brings to mind the pioneers, which is why the glass collector spotlight this month falls on the Westward Ho design of Early American Pattern Glass. The manufacturer catalog name was originally Pioneer, then it became Tippecanoe for an issue or two but the buyers soon dubbed it Westward Ho and so it became.

Continuing development in the glass industry had made possible a process to embellish clear glass with acid finish detailing. In 1879 Gillinder and Sons Glassworks of Philadelphia was among the first to use this innovation in the creation of Westward Ho, which was designed by Jacobus. Gillinder had several earlier successes with Jacobus patterns, so when he suggested the idea, they went with his unusual concept of frosted finials and bands. The result was Westward Ho, one of their most popular patterns. The theme of pioneer life on the western frontier may have been inspired by the Currier and Ives prints which, for years, decorated Jacobus' studio walls.

Details of the pattern include log cabins, fleeting deer, charging bison and most striking of all, a crouching Indian that served as finial knob on lidded pieces. On covered compotes the top was clear with a frosted Indian knob, a frosted band around the vessel carried the wilderness scene.

A few items had only the Indian to identify the theme, while others, for example the goblet, featured the cabin and animals alone set against a background of forest and mountains. Jacobus' molds showed much more sophisticated shapes and intricacies of design than other glass houses were producing. Footed sauce or berry bowls were paired with high-standard covered compotes, rather than simple flat bowls. Oval forms in platters and lower compotes were a new look as well as a little lidded jar intended for relish or small pickles, which came to be known as a marmalade jar. Westward Ho was a sturdy, heavy glass but the number of footed items plus the elaborate finial made it vulnerable to damage. As a consequence the pattern, although widely sold, went collectible in the 1930s. Original issue is so rare today it is seldom found outside of museums. A price guide from the 1990s shows all compotes and platters selling at $150 or above, half gallon and gallon pitchers in the $300 range, smaller items running about $35 to $50, with that elusive marmalade jar at $185. Goblets, wines and cordials are particularly difficult to locate. Even one is a prize to a collector.

Reproductions of Westward Ho have flooded the market many times, beginning in the 1930s when Westmoreland Glass produced a new issue from new molds. The first issue is easy to spot because the frosted areas are too white and feel rough to the touch. Strangely enough, in 2007 the chalky 1930 reproductions are now collectible in their own right. Westmoreland also produced the pattern in colors. A later issue corrected the peculiar frost but it is still easily spotted. On the originals the deer's mouth is a closed line; reproductions show an open mouth. Tiny details are missing, also, including individual hairs on the animal's coats, bark on the logs of the cabin, twigs on tree branches, etc.

L.G. Wright Company reproduced Westward Ho in 1970 to 1971. This was a higher-quality and it is more difficult to distinguish from the original. If you're a collector who values the age of glass, use a black light flashlight in a darkened room to validate the age of glass. Truly old glass will glow with a greenish yellow iridescence or, rarely, an iodine pink shade. If you just enjoy the pattern, be sure you're not paying the price for original issue when you're buying even a good reproduction.

The demand for pattern glass waned in the 1930s with the advent of cheaper and showier Depression Glass. Still, the uniquely American theme of Westward Ho remains a patriotic reminder of the western wave that populated our country. That distinctly American appeal has made it one of the most widely sought after patterns of the glass of the 1800s.
