Chocolate pie always a family favorite

The entire Kansas City metro area is sheathed in ice as this is being written. Traffic is a torturous tangle of fender benders, bumper thumpers and worse. Winter has sunk its bitter teeth into us with a vengeance during February. It's no wonder Mama used to refer to this month as "Febru-weary". My sister took to sending our mother a big bouquet of spring flowers when the shortest month of the year came along to help hold her through to spring daffodils.

We had some happy memories of February at our house, however, because it held not only Valentine's Day but also my late husband's birthday, Feb. 20. The whole crew of Deines kids loved what they referred to as the birthday pie so I always made it for LeRoy's birthday and other family events. One of the few recipes we had from his mother, Elma, it was never written down, so each family made it differently but it that degree, learn to drive, find a was always eaten right up. One of my young nephews, upon seeing this pie appear at a family dessert buffet, yelled across the room, "Hey Dad, Aunt Liza made that dirty snow pie for you!"

Okay, Brad, I guess it does look a little like dirty snow and I sure wish I could make it for you once again. Failing that, here's the recipe so you can whip it up yourself!

Hint before you begin - the sadder but wiser cook advises that the marshmallows be melted in a double boiler as the original instructions were written. I tried it in the microwave once and had hot marshmallow goo all over most of Norton County before I got it all cleaned up. Marshmallows sure do expand in a microwave.

MAMASAID: Don't ever forego a goal because you think you're too old. Go back to college, get new job. When will you be getting any younger? Note: Mama practiced what she preached – she took high school driver training when she was 75, passed with flying colors and got her license!

ELMA'S CHOCOLATE CHIPPIE a/k/a DIRTY SNOW PIE

One package (about 30) large marshmallows, cut in half with scissors

Half a cup of milk

Two cups whipping cream to a volume of four cups (can use Coolwhip)

Four squares of bitter chocolate, frozen and shredded in tiny shreds

One teaspoon real vanilla extract

One 9-inch graham cracker or chocolate cookie pie crust

In the top of a double boiler melt the marshmallows in the milk until there are no lumps remaining. Stir and set aside to cool to room temperature. Stir occasionally so it doesn't start to set up. Lay a big sheet of wax paper on the counter and use a frozen stainless steel bowl and grater to grate the frozen chocolate squares in shreds. It will be difficult and the shreds will want to fly all over the kitchen — that's why the wax paper and the cold utensils. Set shredded chocolate in the refrigerator and keep it cold while you whip the cream. Blend the whipped cream and chocolate shreds into the marshmallow goo, being sure it all gets well mixed since the marshmallow is the jelling agent. Heap into the pie crust and chill several hours or overnight before serving. If you like, use a potato peeler and a Hershey bar to make chocolate curlies to decorate the top.

Variations: My sister-in-law makes this with only two cups of whipped cream — it makes a denser pie with more chocolate than fluff. Another family member uses semisweet chocolate because her family likes the sweeter flavor. Coolwhip, rather than real whipped cream, also produces a sweeter pie. I once tried the wee little chocolate chips, which was easier on the cook, but we didn't like the texture as well. LeRoy liked best the contrast of the bitter chocolate with the sweet marshmallow.
