Home canned food safety hints

Commercial foods are typically prepared in an approved food processing facility and required to display a "best by" or expiration date.

When foods are preserved in the home, however, food safety and security depend on the cook.

The failure to follow a tested recipe or to store food in a safe place can jeopardize food safety, yet recognizing when home preserved foods are past their prime or no longer safe to eat is sometimes a challenge.

Tell-tale signs that suggest food is suspect and should be discarded include:

- Vacuum seal on the lid has been compromised; lid may pop, bulge, or show signs of rust;

- Jar is chipped, cracked or otherwise damaged;
- Evidence of loss of food quality, such as the presence of mold, loss or change of color, texture or off odor.
- Evidence of insect or rodent
