Canning equipment safety hints

Gardeners and farmers' market shoppers who are planning to preserve summer fruits and vegetables are encouraged to check the condition of canning and other food preservation equipment before crops reach their peak.

Increased interest in gardening, the move toward eating more locally grown foods, and desire to reduce grocery bills are contributing to new—and renewed—interest in home food preservation.

While many may remember their mothers or grandmothers preserving freshly harvested fruits and vegetables for winter meals, novices also can be successful in preserving food. It is recommended that those interested in doing food preservation at home should choose tested recipes and follow the directions exactly.

High-acid food like fruits, jams and jellies and pickles, all contain enough acid to be processed in a water bath canner. This method requires a large kettle with a metal rack to hold jars during processing. Tomatoes must have acid (either lemon juice, citric acid or vinegar) added to increase the acidity for safe canning.

When using lemon juice, add 1 tablespoon per pint or 2 tablespoons per quart; for citric acid, add 1/4 (one-fourth) teaspoon per pint or 1/2 (one-half) teaspoon per quart; for vinegar, add 2 tablespoons per pint or 4 tablespoons per quart. Low-acid foods, including vegetables, meats, seafood and soups require pressure canning. Checking the accuracy of the dial gauge and condition of the rubber seal on a pressure canner before canning is essential.

Many K-State Research and Extension offices have the equipment to check the accuracy of a pressure canner gauge.

Simply bring the lid with the gauge, or bring the entire canner, into your local Extension office. If replacement parts are needed, local offices can help provide information on purchasing the parts.

Some older pressure canners are no longer manufactured, so finding replacement parts can be difficult, if not impossible.

More information about safe food preservation is available at your local K-State Research and Extension offices, or e-mail Tranda Watts at twatts@ksu.edu.
