Computers for children now in libraries

The State Library of Kansas (SLK) has awarded grants to 124 Kansas public libraries to help fund the purchase of one AWE Early Literacy Station (an all-in-one digital learning solution for children ages 2-8) in each recipient's library.

In September of 2013, SLK made available a non-competitive grant for Kansas public libraries interested in AWE Early Literacy Stations. Libraries serving a population less than 10,000 paid $500 towards a machine and libraries serving a population over 10,000 paid $1,000 towards a machine. In total, SLK helped purchase 124 AWE Early Literacy Stations throughout Kansas.

The Early Literacy Station offers children a safe, standalone computer, with 60 pre-loaded educational software programs, and does not require an Internet connection to operate. The material spans all curriculum areas:

reading, math, science, social studies, writing, art and music.

"Ensuring reading readiness and on-grade achievement for Kansas' youngest residents is one of the State Library's top priorities," said State Librarian Jo Budler. "Placing these stations in public libraries will help young readers learn and practice the skills they need to be ready for school; and they're having fun!"

Part of the SLK's mission is to promote and support early childhood literacy programs and practices in libraries across the state. Early childhood literacy is what children know about reading and writing before they can actually read or write. SLK supports these efforts through statewide programing, supplemental funding, grants, training sessions, online resources, and circulation of materials.

Local grant recipients are: Logan Library

Long Island Public Library
Norton Public Library
Oakley Public Library
