Dorothy Mae Christensen Feb. 14, 1917 - March 30, 2009

Child mental health experts, for many years, have been concerned about children and their television viewing habits. The most common concern has been when parents or caregivers do not monitor the type of show watched by their children. For instance, it is believed that if children watch a lot of violence on television, they may become numb to violence in general, or may think that it is okay to be aggressive to solve real life problems.

A study in the February 2009, Archives of General Psychology, explains that watching too much television as a child may contribute to depression in later years. Researchers at the University of Pittsburgh and Harvard Medical School looked at the media habits of 4,142 healthy adolescents and calculated

At that time they reported, on an average, watching television for 2.3 hours, watching videos for 37 minutes, playing computer games for 25 minutes, and listening to the radio for 2.3 hours. playing computer games, watching television shows is very time-consuming, all-absorbing, and includes a great deal of advertising. For teenagers, these ads may play a role in making them feel more inadequate or useless. Regardless of the reasons, it appears that parents should be concerned how much daily television their teenagers watch if they want to help them avoid depression later in life.
