Cheyenne County feels some cooler weather than usual in July

Amanda Miller

The temperatures last week has many people checking their calendars to make sure they didn't skip a few months. It certainly felt more like fall than mid-summer outside!

Last week St. Francis had high of only 64 degrees last Wednesday, and only 68 on Thursday. However by Sunday the high reached all the way up to 103.

Cheyenne County was not the only area of Kansas, or the United States for that matter, that got to enjoy unseasonably cool weather. Records were made across the state for the coolest maximum temperature and record low temperatures.

Last Tuesday Goodland, the National Weather Service's local forecast center, tied its record setting lowest maximum temperature of 69 degrees. The old record was set in 1972. The next day brought even cooler temperatures across the area.

Goodland set its coolest maximum temperature last Wednesday with high of 62 degrees. The previous record of 72 degrees was set in 1989, making Wednesday a full 10 degrees cooler than any other high record, according to the National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration's National Weather Service.

The National Weather Service recorded records being broken across the tri-state area. A record low temperature of 49 degrees was set in Hill City, and a record low of 47 degrees was set at McCook, Neb.

The cooler weather is welcomed by some, but others would like to be out at the lake enjoying the sun and summer weather that normally accompanies July. July is usually one of the hottest months of the year. In fact the record high temperature in Kansas was set in July of 1936, with high of 121 degrees according to the National Weather Service.

With the cooler weather some rain has been falling as well, which is a welcome sight after the severe drought northwest Kansas has been enduring.

So what is causing all this fall weather in the middle of summer? It is the result of a chain-reaction, according to Dr. Jeff Masters with Weather Underground.

Tropical Storm Neoguri, the once mighty super typhoon that landed on Japan, did not impact the United States directly. However it did set in motion the chain-reaction that dramatically altered the path of the jet stream and affected weather patterns across the entire Northern Hemisphere.

Neoguri caused an acceleration of the North Pacific jet stream, which caused a large amount of warm, moist tropical air to push over the North Pacific. This amplified a trough of low pressure over Alaska, causing a ripple effect in the jet stream over western North America. This jet stream is similar to the "polar vortex" that people are familiar with from last winter.

After the cooler weather last week, the weekend brought warmer temperatures. With that came one of the largest hail storms in recent memory. Look for the related story in this issue of The Herald.
