"Our women's team has been strong all year, and we finally accomplished what we wanted to at Fort Scott, Coach Russell said. "Andrea single-handedly propelled us into the top five with a superb outing, and Jamie is tough every time out of the box. As always, there is work to do and ways to improve, but we are positioned for an exciting spring."

The women's team has climbed to fifth place overall in the Central Plains Regional standings. The women are only 40 points out of fourth and the only community college currently ranked in the region's

Echoes of the Southwind

By Dorthy L. Mast

History has seldom recorded a social phenomenon quite like the mass impulse that filled the American West with cities and towns and sparked countless unfulfilled schemes for more of the same.

The settlers on the land were generally a sturdy and resourceful people who were spoken of as being endowed with the three p's poverty, providence and pluck.

One early newsman wrote to his family back in Missouri after arriving in Bird City in 1885, "a new western town is truly indescribable in mere words."

An enterprising merchant and his family came by way of Benkelman, Neb., to Bird City in 1885 and as they overlooked the town they were surprised to see the number of buildings being erected.

This merchant was one of a group of men and women doctors, lawyers, merchants, millers, barbers, bootmakers, blacksmiths and druggists who poured westward believing they could transform "The Great American Desert" into a thriving frontier.

However, inevitably this, also, brought shysters, prostitutes, scalaways and those dodging the law but mostly they were serious men and women bound upon the honest building of a new society on the western plains.

By May of 1885 the town site had been surveyed and platted.

Mr. and Mrs. James Slover had erected a small shack to feed the men digging the town well.

Within that same month Mitchell and Mikesell had a drugstore building framed in Atwood and brought over and erected in two days in block 30 and lot 14 (approximate location of the United Methodist trails were the most desirable, Church parsonage today 2003).

The proprietor of a Frontier drugstore was supposed to be an apothecary who knew how to mix various chemicals and prepare the correct formula for medicinal remedies. Alcohol in some form or other formed a prominent ingredient in these medicines.

Many patent medicines were dispensed at the Frontier drugstore.

I could find no further mention of this drugstore in the old papers so it is possible to have change proprietors and many businesses did in those days as it was very competitive.

Due to the influx of wagons and teams to bring building materials from Benkelman, to the town site and provide transportation for the public in June 1885 The Pendarvis and Sons Livery Stable was established in block 29 in lots 22, 23 and 24 (where the Methodist church stands today 2003).

Livery barns with several horses, wagons and buggies for hire, supplied the means for transportation for anyone who possessed the required fee.

When the settler became a little more prosperous he placed his team in the livery barn while he went about his business during the day or overnight leaving the hostler to furnish the required animal care.

Those persons living in town could hire a team and rig to drive into the country or use on a business trip.

The office of the livery barn was a place for loafers and friends to meet and play checkers or cards. Most livery attendants were able to provide strangers with information about the nearby countryside, where the best claims were, where rendered were varied, but 50 miles was considered to be a 24-hour days work for a seasoned team.
