

Be careful during harvest operating machinery

It's been dry, but there will be some corn and milo around the corner. That means harvest is not far off.

Here's hoping it's a safe one.

Operating heavy machinery is always dangerous, and it's especially so when the machines sit around gathering dust much of the year.

Combines will be hauled to town or into the shop for a checkup. Be sure you check the safety features while you're at it.

Guards and shields were put there for a reason. Be sure they're in place.

For accident potential, balers take the prize. They're widow makers.

Power takeoffs are always dangerous. Think twice, then think again, before you mess with one.

Turn machinery off before you work on it. It won't take any longer. You save time if you don't have to go to the hospital.

Then there are the trucks, often the most-neglected part of a farm's equipment. Grain trucks should be checked thoroughly for safety. Check the brakes. You don't want somebody's wife or daughter running through a dead end.

And when driving, on country roads or the highway, drive as though somebody's life depends on it. It does.

Stop at stop signs and blind intersections. It may take a few seconds more, but it'll give you time to know that no one is coming. You don't want to kill anyone on the way to the elevator.

You can save a few minutes by driving fast and running stop signs, but what's that worth compared to someone's life? Maybe even your own?

Besides, these days, there's not enough money in corn to make it worth the risk.

Better to be safe and live to see another season.

Hangin' With Marge

Phone Fun

By Margaret Bucholtz

No one dislikes getting annoying phone calls any worse than I do. It is usually after a day of work and all you want to do is be left alone to get your work done or maybe just be alone.

I enjoy reading the fun things you can do or say on the phone but most of time all I do is read about it. However, one time I did have a little fun playing a trick on my brother.

I dialed a wrong number and then tape recorded the message. You know, the one about "I am sorry but the number you dialed is either not in service or has been disconnected." Then I called my brother (this was before caller I.D.) and when he would answer the phone I would play the recording. After the third time in a row he stopped answering the phone. About an hour later I called again only this time I talked to him and told him that it was me calling and playing that message. I don't remember him laughing very hard but I am sure he felt like saying, as most of us would, "why don't you get a real job, Marge!"
