Filmmakers go through County

By Klimberly Davis
Three young filmmakers traveled through St. Francis and Bird City last week on their way to Boston.

The road is full of people walking, running, biking or skating with a cause, but this group is traveling at 10 miles per hour, filming with one member on a Segway Human Transporter, basically a motorized scooter.

The Segway has two wheels on opposite sides of the platform. A handle bar comes up from the platform, and the rider has to balance himself on it.

The trio — Gannon Weeks, his sister Hunter Weeks and Josh Caldwell, all 27 — started their journey in Seattle on Aug. 9.

Both of the men had worked for Best Software in Phoenix, but quit and moved to Denver, where they started Spinning Blue, the company sponsoring the film.

Ms. Weeks said she has had a corporate job in the past, but most recently worked as an assistant to a behavioral counselor. She quit the job to help make the film although she said she would be interested in going back.

The idea is to cross America while making a documentary and meeting people along the way, said Mr. Weeks. They didn't say what they were planning on doing with film.

They said they are using the Segway to slow the trip down a bit. Mr. Caldwell said the Segway lets them meet a lot more people. Mr. Caldwell, who rides the scooter, says he is able to talk with people along the road while traveling at 10 miles an hour.

On Thursday, the team pulled into Oberlin. They said they met a young police officer in Atwood who was related to Gary Anderson, owner of the LandMark Inn. He suggested the group stay at the inn.

On Thursday they pulled out, heading to Bird City and Oberlin.

The idea is to get to Boston sometime in October. Mr. Weeks said the journey might be stretched out some depending on weather and opportunities. Total mileage is 4,200, with 1,700 of that done and 2,500 to go.

Each place the group has been, said Mr. Caldwell, has been different. There are unique aspects about each part of the country. The most interesting thing, though, is the people they have met along the way. He said they met smoke jumpers, farmers and others. It is great to hear how they enjoy what they are doing.

Mr. Weeks said the most interesting area to him has been the Yakima Valley, east of the Cascades in Washington, where the group was first introduced to farm country. It was neat to see the different kinds of farming, he said.

People in the cities, said Ms. Weeks, don't grasp the idea that they can move to a small town. Both Mr. Caldwell and Mr. Weeks live in Denver and Ms. Weeks lives in Seattle.

The group said the smallest town they have been through was in Wyoming. The state sign outside the town of Highland said the population was 10. Ms. Weeks said they stopped and the population actually was three, all in the same family. She said they had one building which housed a bar, grocery and post office.

"They all thought the team was crazy," she added.

The biggest cities they've visited have been Denver and Seattle.

Mr. Caldwell said he grew up in a small town, but the other two are from the city. None of them had been to Kansas before except driving through.

Ms. Weeks said she expected it to be flat, but it hasn't been. The towns in eastern Colorado weren't very exciting, she said, and they expected Kansas to be that way, but it hasn't been that, either. She said Oberlin has a charm about it. The group got a kick out of the "cobblestone" streets.

By traveling at 10 miles per hour, said Mr. Caldwell, he has had the chance to notice all the little things. When driving through, a person doesn't notice those.

The team planned to stop in Norcatur and possibly have lunch on Friday, and then whiz on to Norton.

Along the way, the group has been interviewing people in the towns. Mr. Weeks said the whole project is independent. Total cost is $100,000.

Salt Cedar control workshop is set

"Managing a highly invasive tree species, Tamarisk (commonly known as salt cedar), is the focus of an upcoming workshop and tour sponsored by the Kansas Grazing Land Coalition and the Kansas Alliance of Wetlands and Streams," said David Kraft, Kansas Grazing Land Coalition coordinator, Emporia. "The workshop and tour will be held on Wednesday, October 6, near Ashland.

"The day will start with check-in and welcome at 9 a.m. at the Gardiner Angus Ranch sale barn located 6 miles west of Ashland, on Highway 160, 5 miles south, and 1 mile west.

"Range expert and landowner perspectives on salt cedar, its spread and detrimental effects, and an overview of the plant and its growth habits will be covered in the morning session at the sale barn facility," he said. "Technical presentations will an overview of ongoing salt cedar control studies. The studies are being funded, in part, through a grant administered by KAWS. The morning will conclude with a panel discussion of riparian area management.

Following a noon meal, which is provided, a tour of salt cedar control sites is scheduled. If weather permits, on-site demonstrations will be conducted. The tour should be completed and wrapped up by mid-afternoon.

For more information and registration please contact Jolie LeClear, Clark County District manager/water quality coordinator at 620.635.2822 ext. 3 or by e-mail at jolie.leclear@ks.nacdn.net
