'Aisling' offers self-expression

COLUMBIA, Mo. (AP)—Jonathan Sawyer wants you to go shopping, and he wants you to have fun doing it.

That's the crux of aisling, the new sport he's invented that invites self-expression in the grocery store by combining performance art and timed competition.

"I was in the grocery store one day, and it was one of those moments when you look around and see everybody shopping, and they are just robots grabbing an orange here, a can of chili there," Sawyer said.

"I just thought it was wrong, and I decided to do something about it."

Sawyer and his strange new sport are the subjects of a documentary film called "American Shopper," currently in production in Columbia. The movie offers real people the chance to compete for $10,000 in cash and prizes in the final contest on Nov. 26 at Schnucks.

On a recent night, a crowd of more than 80 people gathered at Sawyer's first informational meeting at the Activity & Recreation Center to learn more about aisling.

As the filmmakers floated around the room with cameras and boom microphones, the slightly nervous Sawyer had a straight face as he explained his sport. The easy part of aisling is gathering the 15 required items within the three-minute time limit. Three judges evaluate the competitors based on movement, originality and the elusive quality of aislemanship. Competitors perform routines to music and are encouraged to modify their shopping carts.
