State basketball coach Jim Wooldridge will undergo surgery on Wednesday to remove a bulging disk in his neck, the school announced Monday.

Kansas State's next game is at home on Wednesday night against Iowa State, but how much longer Wooldridge will be out is uncertain. The problem has caused numbness in his upper and lower extremities.

Assistant coach Jimmy Elgas will serve as interim coach for the Wildcats (12-7, 3-5 Big 12), who have been reeling from losses to Colorado, Baylor and Oklahoma State.

Wooldridge said in a statement that he has been suffering from the condition for much of the season, but it became more acute the past 10 days and a neurosurgeon on Monday recommended surgery.

"The doctors have informed me that without immediate attention that this condition will only become more serious and permanent," said Wooldridge, 50.

health issues.

Doctors said Wooldridge is suffering from a "significant disk protrusion" at the C3-4 vertebrae in his neck. The school said this is creating pressure on his spinal cord and causing numbness in the upper and have a better idea by Friday.' lower extremities.

Doctors also discovered a disk bulge and a small bone spur at the C5-6 vertebrae.
