Kansas wheat history to be celebrated

MANHATTAN — Wheat has wheat almost every year, the har- and several other names was desig- attend the banquet on Saturday been the most important crop in vest didn't even reach 1 million Kansas for over 100 years, and Kansas State University has played a major role in the development of new wheat varieties during that time, said Jim Shroyer, K-State Research and Extension crop production specialist.

"Most producers in the state are very familiar with some of the most widely grown varieties released by the K-State wheat breeding program — Overley, Jagger, Karl, Newton, Larned, and many others," Shroyer said.

But there are some little-known facts that may surprise even the most experienced Kansas wheat producers, according to Shroyer:

- The first crop of wheat in Kansas was grown in Johnson County, near Fairway, in 1839.
- Although Kansas now raises 300 million bushels or more of ter wheat known as "Little May"

• Spring wheat was the most common type of wheat grown in Kansas until the 1870's.

The wheat from these varieties matured so late in the season that the crop was routinely hurt by heat and diseases before it could be harvested.

- The first winter wheat grown in Kansas was not the hard red variety Turkey, but soft red winter wheat. The soft wheats were poorly adapted to conditions on the Plains, and were often devastated by winterkill and drought.
- Turkey was not introduced in Kansas until 1873, 34 years after wheat was first grown in the state. As late as 1889, 16 years after Turkey began to be grown in southcentral Kansas, a soft red win-

• During the early years of wheat production in Kansas, hard wheats were heavily discounted by millers because of processing difficulties.

• Turkey was not hardy enough for much of Kansas.

It was not until M.A. Carleton, a U.S. Department of Agriculture scientist and former K-State faculty member, brought Kharkof and Crimean to Kansas from Russia, that wheat production began to
