Iowa farmers tell EPA to exempt them from dust proposal law

PERRY, Iowa (AP) — Mud firm on the administration's stance farmers could bankrupt themselves posed more of a problem than dust for Iowa farmers hoping to demonstrate their opposition to dust control regulations proposed by the Environmental Protection Agency.

A group of farmers had planned to show EPA Administrator Stephen Johnson on Wednesday just how much dust is stirred up during a soybean harvest, but a steady rain washed out the exhibi-

Instead of watching a combine churn through the soybean field, about 30 damp farmers huddled with Johnson in a two-car garage and criticized the proposed regulations. Farming generates dust and the new rules will lead to lawsuits against farmers, they said.

Sen. Charles Grassley, R-Iowa, who invited Johnson to meet with farmers, displayed two color photos of him standing near a combine kicking up dust in a field on his family farm. He has called the Bush farming in the new dust rules "idi-

"It would be like the EPA saying or the farmer saying today, God, don't let the wind blow more than two miles an hour. It's impossible,"

Heck, who is also director of the Iowa Soybean Association, said farm dust is generated for brief periods and quickly dissipates. It can't be avoided, he said.

As a combine picks a soybean plant, it shreds the seed pods, stems and leaves and blows those parts back onto the field, while the beans are collected in a bin. Some of the "I'm still concerned about the discarded plant parts are pulverized to fine particles, which causes the dust during harvest. A similar process is used to harvest corn.
