

Northeast dairy farmers ease the hurt by offering premium product

PLEASANT VALLEY, N.Y. (AP) — It's tough to be a dairy farmer right now.

Business costs are soaring and wholesale milk prices are low.

It can be even tougher to raise cows on prime real estate in the mid-Hudson Valley, where many old dairy farms have been sliced up to make way for subdivisions with $400,000 homes.

"This is the high-rent district, no doubt about it," said farmer Sam Simon, standing in his barn as his milking cows chomped on hay. "But you cannot deny the farmer who has worked for 50 years the fruit of his labor."

Simon's solution to the price pinch is Hudson Valley Fresh, a high-quality milk brand that usually travels less than 35 miles from cow to counter.

Consumers willing to pay a bit more get to buy local, and participating farmers fetch a higher price for their milk.

Farmers in populated pockets of the Northeast are creating similar local brands to boost income.

"We were basically processing a faceless product, the truck comes and takes it away," said Robin Chesmer, one of the family farmers contributing to a venture called The Farmer's Cow in Connecticut. "We're giving an identity to our milk, giving people a reason to buy our milk."

Wholesale prices dairy farmers receive under the government regulatory structure have dropped in recent years, though fuel and feed cost more. Many farmers say it costs them more to produce milk than the price they're getting.

Taxes and operating costs can run especially high in the mid-Hudson Valley areas like Dutchess County, which has been steadily losing its sleepy, rural flavor as New York City's suburbs push out.

The county has been losing dairy farms at a faster clip than the state, dropping from 67 to 45 from 1997-2002, according to federal statistics. There are no county-level records beyond 2002, but Simon now counts 23.

Simon, 60, helped start Hudson Valley Fresh, under which five local dairy farms started segregating out milk in May 2005 that normally would be marketed by their multistate milk cooperative, Agri-Mark.

Sold in containers with a minimalist green "Hudson Valley Fresh" label, the milk is free of recombinant bovine growth hormone, a controversial substance some farmers use to boost milk production.

The milk is not certified organic, but it has somatic cell counts well below the federal guidelines.

Simon said cell count is an indicator of a healthy herd, and thus milk quality.

A half gallon of Hudson Valley Fresh costs around $3, competing with half gallons that retail around $1.80.

"This is the high-rent district, no doubt about it. But you cannot deny the farmer who has worked for 50 years the fruit of his labor."

But enough people are buying the product to sustain 1,350 gallons a week.

Simon said the niche product does well thanks to a market heavy on suburban parents and city dwellers coming up to weekend homes.

The attractive feature for farmers is that they're guaranteed $20 per hundred pounds of milk, more than $7 above the current regulatory price.

Simon says the system guarantees farmers a living wage.

"All my milk would go there if they could sell more," said David Coon of Coon Brothers, a local contributor to Hudson Valley Fresh. "We've been losing money on milk all year."

Agri-Mark spokesman Doug DiMento said the co-op is eager to help farmers get higher prices for their milk and supports similar local brands like The Farmer's Cow and Rhody Fresh in Rhode Island.

The alliances all take advantage of being in populated areas.

"What we try to do here in Rhode Island is take advantage of where we are," said James Hines of the Rhode Island Dairy Farms Cooperative.

"We felt people would pay a few pennies more to support a local product."

Hudson Valley Fresh farmers remain members of Agri-Mark, which allows them to process their milk separately at a local bottling plant. The cooperative, which charges an administrative fee to Hudson Valley Fresh, still pays the farmers the regulatory wholesale price.

Hudson Valley Fresh makes up the difference with revenues from retail sales.

This allows the farmers to receive a higher price for their milk without cutting themselves off from the co-op system and having to pay for their own processing system.

Simon said sales have been growing steadily, and he is looking south at the millions of milk drinkers in New York City and Westchester County.

Topeka religious community rethinking security

TOPEKA (AP) — An arson fire that caused an estimated $3 million to a Topeka church — the third arson-related church fire in just over six months in the city — has local ministers wondering if they need to beef up security.

The Friday morning fire at St. David's Episcopal Church is believed to have started in the chapel — which was open to the public 24 hours a day — and spread through the larger, adjacent sanctuary. Fire officials determined the blaze was the result of arson.

The Rev. Don Davidson, rector at St. David's, said the fire has religious leaders questioning whether it's still safe to have such an open-access policy.

"I think every church is going to reassess their security," Davidson said. "If there are any left that have 24-hour chapels, they may have to come to terms with the risk."

In late April, an arson fire caused $250,000 damage to Hillside Community Church. In early June, Cornerstone Community Church was the victim of attempted arson.

But neither of those churches had 24-hour access and were closed for the night when the fires broke out.
