Interest in politics; Post-traumatic stress

Dear Dr. Brothers: During the past summer, I fell in love with a woman, and we plan to marry next spring -- actually, to celebrate our meeting and my parents' anniversary, it will include a well-deserved vacation. Right now, my parents and I are all caught up in the election, and, much to my amazement, my girlfriend revealed that she'd never voted and has absolutely no interest in politics. I guess we were just so wound up with each other that we never spoke about this. Both my parents and I are stunned to learn this, and though they haven't said it, I suspect they're wondering how much else I don't know about this woman. All I really know is that I love her. -- W.D.

war. All our freedoms, the things we take for granted, are closely related to politics. Anyone who claims to be bored with politics is unaware of all this and unaware of the responsibilities that are part of a democracy.

Dear Dr. Brothers: My family was thrilled to have my brother finally return from Iraq after serving there for what seemed like forever to us. But he's not adjusting well at all. He's impatient with his two little children and his wife. He wakes up screaming, and sometimes isn't certain whether he's still in Iraq. If this goes on, I'm not sure that his marriage will last. He's one of those tough, proud guys who thinks he has to be right. Is there anything I, or anyone, can do? -- S.V.

Dear S.V.: Try to explain to him that a surprising number of servicemen who served in this war have psychological and emotional problems after they return. This is nothing to be ashamed of. About one in six suffers from post-traumatic stress. What you've described are common symptoms of this, and it's essential for him to get help -- as soon as possible, before any further damage is done to his marriage and to his family. He also should be made aware that soldiers returning from Iraq had higher rates of this type of problem because of their lengthy stays in the war-torn country, and because their actual exposure to combat was so great.

Help is readily available to veterans, but those who need it most are often the least likely to ask for it.
