Love stinks; Deer hunter may be off target with relationship

By Dr. Joyce Brothers

Dear Dr. Brothers: I know this sounds crazy, but the smell of my boyfriend turns me off! It's not that he's stinky -- as a matter of people I've ever met -- it's just that when I get close enough to cuddle with him, the smell of him makes me want to run and hide! I've never had this problem with previous beaus, and it's not that our relationship has soured, but short of wearing a nose plug, I'm at a loss about what to do. Is there more to this reaction of mine than meets the nose? Help! -- P.B.

a person's smell may actually be a deciding factor in whether you find him or her attractive. D.S. Women seem to be more sensitive when it comes to sniffing out the right man, but men also respond to olfactory cues like perfume and incense.

I would suggest a trip to the store to sample the scents available for men's cologne. That way, you can decide what scent best suits you. Purchase the cologne for your boyfriend as a surprise gift, or even better, overcome your aversion to his his hunting. Would you be able personal scent, but if not, perhaps it's time to pack up. Chemistry is also in how you two interact, and we all know that oil and water don't mix, no matter fact, he's one of the most hygienic how long you stir. But don't fool yourself into a quick fix when a good hard look at your situation may be better. Your nose may be telling you something that your heart already knows!

Dear Dr. Brothers: I've been dating this guy for almost six months now, and things are starting to get pretty serious. Everything had been sunshine and rainbows until last Sunday. It turns out that was Dear P.B.: We often hear that the first day of hunting season, opposites attract, but we never and my jaw hit the floor as I saw really ask why. It turns out that my boyfriend pull into my drivethe nearly indefinable concept way with a dead deer in the back of chemistry between two people of his pickup truck. I've been too tures Syndicate may actually have more to do shocked to talk this over with him. with their noses than with their and the thought of that poor dead hearts. Research has shown that animal in his truck keeps racing through my mind, even though I knew he hunted. Any advice? --

> Dear D.S.: You face a difficult decision and need to ask yourself some hard questions. Even though you have been dating him for six months, it's still early enough in the relationship to make the decision of whether to continue it or not. Simply ignoring your obvious strong feelings about deer hunting will only lead to resentment in the future.

Only you can decide your bring your man to the store so personal threshold of tolerance. you can agree upon it together. Ask yourself just what it is that Most likely, you will be able to disturbs you so much about

Senate rejected calls from both parties' presidential candidates to take an election-year break from pork-barrel spending as a Democratic-run Congress passed budget plans that would torpedo hundreds of billions of dollars in tax cuts won by President Bush.

John McCain, the GOP nominee-to-be, couldn't attract even a majority of Senate Republicans to vote with him Thursday night behind the earmark moratorium touted by party conservatives as a to handle it if he was given a chance to explain all his motivations to you? Does his enjoyment of this activity "count"? Would it be helpful to you to know if he's been raised in a family where hunting is a tradition, or would it upset you further? Try to ferret out what your core beliefs are, what defines you as a person, and what you can and cannot compromise in a relationship. It's these decisions we make early on in a relationship that define how honest it will be. And mental images, too, have a tendency to stick. If you can't get that picture out of your head now, just think how you'll feel once your mental photo album is filled. (c) 2008 by King Fea-
