Getting married to pay the bills

BY DR. JOYCE BROTHERS

Dear Dr. Brothers: My fiance and I are living together, and are planning to be married in a year and a half. His company has subsidies for spouses, so when we actually sign the marriage license, we will get almost $1,000 more income per month. My fiance doesn't care when we sign the papers, and he left the decision up to me. I feel like if we eloped now to get the paperwork in order, it would cheapen the marriage and take away from the significance of the ceremony we're planning. Am I just being spoiled? Is it silly for me to turn down free money? -- B.P.

Dear B.P.: At first look, it can seem silly to turn down "free money," as you put it. But if this money comes at a price that you can't live with, then it's not really free at all. This question brings up a very fundamental issue about how you view and value marriage. Every person places a different value on the various ceremonies and legal proceedings surrounding marriage. For some, signing the paperwork is the critical moment; for some it is the moment the minister or justice of the peace declares you "husband and wife." Regardless of what your marriage means to you, or what the important moment is for you, it is your prerogative to keep that moment sacred. If that means not accepting a subsidy for pushing up the date you planned, then you shouldn't change your date just for that reason.

You should always weigh the consequences of a financial decision like this one. Certainly there are other factors at play in your situation, but you should get used to jointly having to make difficult decisions involving money. Although your fiance has left this decision up to you, you should discuss it with him and get his input, like you would do with any other financial decision that will affect both of you together.

Dear Dr. Brothers: I'm writing to you about something that happened long in the past. I cheated on my wife once many years ago and, unbeknownst to me, fathered a child. I've been faithful ever since, and my family doesn't know about this one terrible mistake. I just found out about this child, though, and I don't know what to do. Do I tell my family and try to make this right through honesty, or would it be less hurtful to keep it from them? -- C.A.

Dear C.A.: Keeping an affair from your family can seem like the least hurtful option at first, but it can end up being the biggest source of pain when the secret does come out. Everyone makes mistakes, and mistakes like these can be forgiven, if not forgotten. You can apologize and work through the issues with your family if you admit to the indiscretion. When you keep something like this from your family, though, you're taking a big risk. If you don't get caught, it can be for the best to try to protect them from the pain, but if you do get caught in the lie, the damage is much worse than telling the truth in the first place.

For your children, it may be difficult at first for them to come to terms with having another sibling they didn't know about. This also will take your status as a parent down off the pedestal it may be on for your children. Revealing these secrets from your past can cause them to question how well they truly know you, and that can be hard to overcome. But in the end, the longer you continue the lie and the longer you continue to deceive your family, the more pain and distress you'll cause them, and the more challenging it will be to overcome together.
