

Safety week focuses on prevention

“On-the-job fatalities are not statistics,” American Society of Safety Engineers President Michael W. Thompson, said Monday during a meeting in Washington, D.C., to recognize North American Occupational Safety and Health Week.

Thompson cited recent accidents to substantiate his point.

“Just look at the recent crane accident fatalities – last week a man was crushed to death in Annapolis while working on a crane,” he said.

“A few weeks ago people died in New York City on a Saturday when a crane tumbled – changing lives and a neighborhood forever. Another sad part of that story is that we communicated key crane safety information to the public and our members recently and helped the media, including one reporter in Florida.

Her crane incident story appeared with the headline ‘It could happen here’ You know what? It did,” he said.

A day after the story appeared a crane toppled in Miami killing more workers – including a member of the American Society of Safety Engineers, he said.

“That member’s family is now setting up a scholarship in his name through the ASSE Foundation – one way they are working to face the pain of losing a father, a husband – these are not just statistics, these are people we are losing.”

“They are our family, our friends, our co-workers – not just a number. We need to keep working to increase the dialogue worldwide on the importance of making workplaces safer for all to prevent these tragedies.”

Yet, people are still dying from on-the-job injuries, he said. The number was close to 6,000 people in 2006 – so everyone needs to look to this safety and health week as an opportunity for all to start or continue the dialogue on the need for more companies, employers and employees to focus on being safe at work,” Thompson said.

In the U.S. alone, the National Institute of Occupational Safety and Health reported that occupational injuries and illness expenditures total nearly $171 billion a year and injury and illness costs can approach up to 5 percent of an organization’s total costs.

Establishing and sustaining effective safety and health systems can reduce costs by 20 to 40 percent, the report noted.

Safety’s positive return on investment is gaining greater attention too, Thompson said.

“It’s no secret that workplace fatality rates and injuries continue to go down, due in part to the work of safety and health professionals.
