Adults shouldn't lie to parents

Dear Harlan,
About a year ago, I met a wonderful man who swept me off my feet.

We split up when I hit a rough patch, but now we are back together. However, during our split he moved to Seattle. We both agreed that the only way to truly re-establish our relationship would be if I went to Seattle. I decided to move there for a few months over the summer.

I am a college student (age 21), and I am still financially dependent on my parents. Because I needed a blessing from my parents to go to Seattle, I lied and told them that we are no longer dating. I have not lied outright to my parents for some time. I feel very guilty about it. It is now time for them to know about us being together, especially since I have the very strong hunch he is going to propose or suggest that we elope. I want everyone, including my parents, to know that we are together and in love. I'm so worried about this that I have been losing sleep. How can I tell my parents about this lie without losing the close relationship I have with them?

— Laura

Dear Laura,
The answer is simple — adults shouldn't lie to their parents. If you're mature enough to get married, you shouldn't have to lie.

If college funding is the issue, graduate and then move to Seattle. If there's a cultural issue, find a spiritual leader or family member to guide you. If there's a problem, manage it — but don't lie. Tell them the truth. Admit you were wrong. Take the heat and work to rebuild their trust. And don't run off and get married so fast. If your relationship is this wonderful, a few years of dating will prove to everyone that everything is so wonderful. Besides, you sound like you could use a few more years to grow up.

Colby College plans summer science sleep-over

Curious teens are invited to enroll in the Summer Science Sleep-Over Camp to be held June 2-6 on the Colby Community College campus.

The camp, under the direction of CCC instructor Dr. Angie Rivenshield, will allow chaperoned teens to learn about science in a practical and fun way.

"The camp, for students age 12-16, will be held from 8 a.m.-5 p.m. each day," said Rivenshield. "They will experience the thrill of chemical reactions, splattered eggs, physics of roasted marshmallows, crime scenes, anthropology, biotechnology, low-flying leaf blowers, microcosmos, and much more."

Camp participants will stay in the college dormitories with meals provided in the CCC cafeteria.

"The camp will be fun," said Rivenshield.

"Volunteer chaperones are welcome. Those who are interested in assisting with the camp may contact me at the college."
