Kansas legislators can't escape debate over drive to raise taxes to boost education spending each year.

"Most of what we've added in terms of funding in recent years, that's now at risk, was put in to drive student achievement, and unfortunately, if we have to reduce dollars, that's where it's going to come back out of," said Mark Tallman, a lobbyist for the Kansas Association School Boards. "We're going to be advocating raising revenue."

But Parkinson — whose active support is crucial if any proposal is to pass - has sent mixed signals.

He said during an Oct. 30 news conference that Kansas had to avoid "crippling" budget cuts and was "very close" to being forced into considering higher taxes. But five days later, he told the Law*rence Journal-World* that he hopes to get through next year without a tax increase.

Last week, Parkinson spokesman Seth Bundy declined to discuss whether Parkinson will propose revenue-raising measures in January.

But others already are floating ideas, and they start with closing at least some of the dozens of exemptions to the sales tax.

The most far-reaching proposal comes from Ed Hammond, president of Fort Hays State University, who pitched the idea of overhauling the Kansas tax system during a late-October tour of the state. He argued the state should eliminate all exemptions - a move that would have Kansas adding the sales tax to services, utility bills and prescription drugs – to raise money. But he'd offset those changes with others, such as lowering the overall sales tax rate and eliminating the corporate income tax, to keep Kansas businessfriendly.

Senate Minority Leader Anthony Hensley, a Topeka Democrat, said the state needs to review its exemptions. He said some should stay, specifically those for utility bills and prescriptions, but argued that advocates for others should be forced to justify them. Even Emler, who's wary of raising taxes, said legislators ought to examine the exemptions to see if a few amount to luxuries.

Supporters of closing exemptions argue that such a step isn't a tax increase because it doesn't raise the sales tax rate but only closes loopholes.

But other legislators are skeptical, noting that many exemptions were designed to help nonprofit stimulate business activity.

For example, Senate Majority Leader Derek Schmidt noted that farmers don't pay the sales tax on new equipment. Eliminating the exemption means a farmer buyowe the state more than $21,000 in sales tax.

'That's going to look remarkably like a tax increase, because it is," said Schmidt, an Independence Republican.

Hensley and some fellow the state. He said the state may be groups such as the Girl Scouts or Democrats also have pointed to only months away from starting an tax breaks legislators approved starting in the 1990s, when the economy was more robust. Over time, they note, those breaks have saved Kansans several billion dollars, with the bulk going to busiing a $400,000 combine would nesses. The idea was to encourage new and expanded businesses and more jobs.

House Speaker Mike O'Neal said those tax breaks stimulated economic activity, which created jobs and generated revenues for economic recovery and shouldn't tinker with its tax codes. "We just need to hunker down and see this recession through," said O'Neal, a Hutchinson Republican. "Then our businesses can rebound."

And O'Neal and his fellow legislators already are marshaling their arguments for a debate on tax issues because they sense they can't avoid it next year.
