which is not monitored but rather stores the images for the police to download later. Jones said he had about a three-day period where the theft had to have happened, but he still had a lot of images to sift through.

He found one picture which showed a person taking several of the wooden lambs. The image is not clear enough to identify the thief, Jones said, but police think it is likely a Caucasian woman with shoulder-length dark hair.

"I'm curious what they might be doing with them," he added.

Jones said the Abilene Hustlers 4-H club, which puts up the nativity set, doesn't want to press charges, but would like the lambs back.

"It's hard work making those," he said. "It's just not right to steal anything, but especially from a nativity scene at Christmastime for crying out loud."

Jones said he is hoping that someone will recognize the person in the photo or know where the lambs are and call police. The number is 460-4460.

ed to," Armstrong said, "so they are making a spot for new taps in the system."

Workers said they plan to re-route the main, replacing the old iron pipe with new plastic, to go around the trouble spot. Then the Free Press and Sunflower Bank will get new taps.

Armstrong said the problems experienced over the past summer have prompted the city to have Kansas Rural Water out of Wichita come with listening equipment to help target the worst leaks. The listening checks will help in making sure they are spending dollars where they are most needed, she said.

Armstrong had praise for the Public Works crew, which she said stayed into the middle of the night over the weekend and worked long hours Monday on the broken main.

groups based on regions. Because there were only a handful of people representing northwest Kansas, Noble said, they were paired with representatives from the southwest. Together, they identified several issues that might be affecting dropout rates in this part of the state including lack of parent support and involvement, poverty and lack of communication among parents, teachers and students.

They also identified some of the unique challenges that the region faces, such as lack of fine arts classes, shifting values among students and problems attracting teachers.

They then came up with some ideas how to improve the dropout rates, such as helping students understand that there are jobs in the region that require higher education, changing mindsets about dropping out of school and helping students who need to work full time.

nology division chair and the Communications Technology department coordinator for technical school. A Colby native, he received an associate's degree in 1992 from the college here.

"Our first goal of the five-year plan is to have a minimum of 10 online courses developed and offered by CCC," he said.

He began work at the college last Monday. Reilley said he lives in Colby and has been commuting to Goodland.

"I was ready for a change," he said, "and this job is a great match for my skills and career goals."

Deb Schwanke, public information director for the college, said officials pursued the Title III grant to address three issues: declining enrollment, limited resources and inadequate revenue sources for development and expansion of distance delivery technology and services. The application was made two years ago, and the approval finally materialized in November, she said.

Title III is a part of the Higher Education Act of 1965, Ellison said. Its programs are designed to expand access to educational programs and increase enrollment revenue.

Reilley and his wife Shannon have five children, Troy 17; Jessica, 15; Courtney, 12; Landon, 9; and Aden, 3. He is the son of Wes and Izetta Rummel and the late Mike Reilley of Colby.

Caregivers deserve recognition, too

In 2009, 31.2 percent of American households surveyed included one caregiver, said Debra Sellers, Kansas State University Research and Extension specialist on adult development and aging.

The study, conducted by the National Alliance for Caregiving in with the American Association of Retired Persons and paid for by the MetLife Foundation, also found that 66 percent of caregivers are women, she said.

The average age of the caregivers was 48, said Sellers, who noted that it often is the daughter who lives the closest who takes responsibility for aging parents, grandparents or extended family.

These responsibilities add stress, particularly when an illness is progressive or terminal, said Sellers, who advises family members to work together by:

- Offering to share responsibility and/or relieving a caregiver regularly.
- Helping to relieve financial pressures.

Family members living away from home can assist by hiring help to relieve a caregiver, researching health-care options and helping to cover costs, she said.

In working together, family members can ease the stress for the recipient and the caregiver, Sellers said.
