doesn't have three-phase electric service. He is visiting with the city about the cost for installation, he said, and needs to hold off on any decisions until that is determined. Schrock also said he was ready with contract terms that would allow the county to take bids for mowing of its roads. He said anyone who's interested in the work can come to the Road and Bridge Department in the basement of the courthouse to see the terms of the contract. The commissioners emphasized the contract needs to say that the commissioners reserve to right to reject any or all bids. In other business, the commissioners:

- Read the emergency medical service monthly report, which showed 420 ambulance runs this year as compared to 402 at this time last year.
- Talked about raising the amount of the suggested donation to ride the county transportation van, but agreed to leave it at $1.
- Heard from Schrock that the road department is in the process of digging up the old underground pipe to the chillers at the courthouse. He said they had been able to purchase new pipe for the chillers in town.
- Agreed that a 3 percent salary increase for employees would not include people who are hired to work part time.

family and the others living with them were arrested and deported to concentration camps. She died in March 1945, nine months after she was arrested. The 15-year-old had kept a diary which was saved by one of the family's helpers. Her diary was first published in 1947, and today has been translated into 67 languages and is considered to be one of the most widely read books in the world. The exhibit introduces visitors to the events leading up to World War II and the government-directed killing of Jew, Gypsies, the disabled, Slavs and others under German control. It also depicts individuals who chose to join the Nazi party and become perpetrators, those who were bystanders, as well as those who were willing to resist the Nazi tyranny. The life history of Anne Frank and her family is the main thread running through the exhibit. It is a story of world events and the Frank family before, during and after Hitler's rise to power, along with his Nazi party. The exhibit challenges visitors to look for ways to resolve differences without violence, to learn about human rights laws and to get involved in their government.

Brownback selects adjutant general

TOPEKA (AP) - Kansas Gov.-elect Sam Brownback has nominated a federal official to serve as the state Highway Patrol's superintendent and a state legislator to serve as the head of the Kansas National Guard. Brownback on Friday announced his selection of Ernest Garcia as the patrol's leader and state Rep. Lee Tapanelli as state adjutant general. Both appointments must be confirmed by the Kansas Senate.

Garcia will return to Kansas from Washington, where he's been serving in the management of the U.S. Selective Service System, including as its acting director. Tapanelli, of Ozawkie, is a colonel in the Army National Guard who's been serving as assistant adjutant general since July. His promotion to brigadier general is awaiting approval from the U.S. Senate.

Recently discovered documents shed light on Eisenhower's farewell speech

tate foreign policy. One document features a typewritten note from Eisenhower lamenting that when he joined the Army in 1911, there were 84,000 soldiers - a number that ballooned ten-fold by 1960. "The direct result of this continued high level of defense expenditures has been to create a permanent armaments industry of vast proportions, where none had existed before," he wrote in the passage, a variation of which reached the delivered speech on Jan. 17, 1961. Eisenhower biographer David Nichols noted that while the speech is known for the phrase "military-industrial complex," the president had warned about military growth and the Cold War threats throughout his presidency. "He was always talking about the Cold War and the threat to American values and the danger that America would become a garrison state," Nichols said. "The military wanted a lot more than he was willing to give them. It frustrated the Army. He thought about it all the time." Born in 1890, Eisenhower grew up in Kansas and graduated from the U.S. Military Academy. During World War II, he commanded the Allied Forces in Europe, including the D-Day invasion of France. After the war he became president of Columbia University and the first commander of NATO before running for president 1952, a campaign that featured the slogan "I like Ike." He died in 1969. Nichols, who is working on a book about Eisenhower and the Suez Canal Crisis, said historians often overlook the president because of his weak skills as an orator and outward persona. But Nichols said Eisenhower was heavily involved in his speeches, often rewriting them himself up until moments before delivery. The presidents' brother, Milton Eisenhower, and Moos' staff helped him develop his farewell speech. Milton Eisenhower's notations are found throughout the rough drafts, including wholesale changes on one prepared just 10 days before the president spoke on television. Weissenbach said Milton Eisenhower was part of the president's inner circle, along with the president's son John.

"That to me illustrates how Milton had a take-charge moment where he wasn't pleased with the direction it was taking and made an overhaul. Obviously he wouldn't have done it without the blessing of his brother," Weissenbach said. Nichols said Milton Eisenhower had a special relationship with his brother throughout his presidency.

However, he said, little exists in the public record of his involvement, outside a few memos in the archives. "Eisenhower kept marvelous records on what he did, in the Oval Office, the hospital, but his conversations with Milton were off the record," Nichols said. "I only wish and pray that we could uncover some notes."
