Kansas Legislature begins new session

man Republican from Overland Park, said repealing the 1-cent increase in the Kansas sales tax passed last year should be a top priority. She said the state needs to get away from the practice of granting tax exemptions and abatements in order to entice economic development.

"We have to get a sensible tax policy all across the state of Kansas," O'Hara said. "It's going to be a process.'

Rep. Terry Calloway, another freshman Republican from Pittsburg, said his focus was on helping create more jobs in southeast Kansas, which has seen manufacturing jobs evaporate in the past five years.

"We can't sit and wait for help to come to us," said Calloway, who defeated incumbent Democrat Julie Menghini over issues of taxes and spending in November.

Monday's events began with the inauguration of Republican Gov. Sam Brownback in the House chamber, a move prompted by a heavy snow that blanketed Topeka and much of Kansas.

In the Senate, five new members took their seats, including replacements for two who were elected to statewide office. Republicans hold a 32-8 advantage over Democrats.

One Democrat, Sen. Janis Lee of Kensington, is expected to resign later this month when she takes an appointment to the Kansas Court of Tax Appeals.

In contrast to the House bill introductions, the Senate introduced a measure to create a natural resources subcabinet position and a commission that would regulate the medical practice of perfusion.

"A lot of people are going to be looking to the Senate for moderation and pragmatism," said House Minority Leader Paul Davis, a Lawrence Democrat.

He said the election made prospects difficult for the coalition of Democrats and moderate Republicans who pushed through the tax increase last year.

"We have to recognize that farright Republicans are in firm control," Davis said.

Brownback has said he doesn't support repealing the sales tax increase, but is willing to work with legislators to reduce the burden on taxpayers and reduce government spending. He also has suggested imposing a 10-year income tax break for residents who move from out of state to rural counties with declining population.

The plan may be a tough sell with House Republicans like O'Hara, who called it "a Band-Aid" approach to the economy.

"We need solutions, not Band-Aids," she said.

"Growth will be a key part of it," Brownback told the Associated Press during a brief interview Tuesday. "It will be the Road Map in legislative form."

Legislators were waiting for glimpses of Brownback's proposed budget for the fiscal year beginning July 1. They're expected to learn more details government Thursday morning, when his staff his is to brief the House Appropriations and Senate Ways and Means committees.

Brownback has ruled out raising taxes as likely to hurt the economic recovery. A GOPcontrolled Legislature increased the state's sales tax last year at former Democratic Gov. Mark Parkinson's urging, but elections gave conservatives more power, the pro-spending coalition less.

The state is facing a shortfall despite last year's tax increase largely because it used federal economic stimulus money to put off deeper cuts in aid to public schools and social services. That money is expected to disappear in the next fiscal year.

revenues and current spending Chamber of Commerce. commitments for the next fiscal year is about 9 percent, and public schools, higher education and social services consume 88 percent of the state tax dollars in the current budget.

"I think the governor's got a very difficult job ahead of him in crafting a budget that balances without doing great damage to important programs and services," said Senate Vice President about his spending plan for state John Vratil, a Leawood Republican.

Some Republicans are looking forward to taking on the challenge with Brownback.

Government efficiency is something we've advocated for many years," said House Majority Leader Arlen Siegfreid, an Olathe Republican. "The fact that we have a reduced amount of revenues gives us an excellent opportunity to put that into effect.

Meanwhile, business leaders were looking forward to hearing Brownback talk about creating new private-sector jobs and lessening regulation.

"It is the private sector that funds state government, and the focus rightly should be there," said Kent Eckles, a vice presi-The gap between projected dent and lobbyist for the Kansas on late-term abortions.

Democrats, facing GOP majorities of 32-8 in the Senate and 92-33 in the House, said they're also eager to see details of the new governor's proposals. Their leaders scheduled a news conference for immediately after the speech to outline the party's expected objections.

Democrats argued during the campaign that Brownback's "Road Map" was vague and designed to divert attention away from his opposition to abortion and other views on social issues giving him strong appeal among religious conservatives.

In his inaugural address, Brownback extolled faith as a Kansas virtue and decried the "crassness of modernity."

Some abortion opponents said they didn't expect Brownback to mention their issues. He's already said he'll sign anti-abortion legislation the Legislature sends him but as governor, will concentrate on economic issues.

"He's already made statements saying that he supports the fact that there'll be these types of bills that will come along," said Rep. Steve Huebert, a Valley Center Republican who's sponsoring a measure to tighten restrictions
