Weed control offers options

Clint Milliman

• Knowledge for Life

There are several herbicide options for controlling winter annual broadleaf weeds in wheat. Generally, fall applications provide the best control of winter annual weeds with any herbicide, as long as the weeds have emerged. The majority of winter annual weeds usually emerge in the fall, although you can still have some emergence in the spring, especially if fall precipitation after planting is limited. However, those that come up in the spring often are not very competitive with the crop.

Some herbicides can work well even when applied during the dormant part of the season, while others work best if the crop and weeds are actively growing. The key difference relates to the degree of soil activity provided by the herbicide. Herbicides that have good residual activity, such as Glean, Finesse, Amber, and Rave can generally be applied in January and February and still provide good weed control, assuming you have proper conditions for the application. Most herbicides which depend on foliar uptake, will not work nearly as well during the mid-winter months, when the wheat and weeds aren't actively growing.

Spring herbicide applications can be effective for winter annual broadleaf weed control as well, but timing and weather are critical to achieve good control. Spring applications are most effective soon after green-up when weeds are in the rosette stage of growth, and during mild weather. Once weeds begin to bolt and wheat starts to develop more canopy, herbicide performance decreases dramatically.

Huskie is a relatively new herbicide that can provide good control of a variety of broadleaf weeds with excellent crop safety from the 2-leaf to boot stage of growth. This is a premix herbicide. Because it has limited residual activity, it works best when weeds and wheat are actively growing and with milder weather.

Another important consideration is crop tolerance at different application timings. For example, 2,4-D should not be applied in the fall or until wheat is fully tillered in the spring. On the other hand, any herbicide containing dicamba can be applied after wheat has 2 leaves, but should not be applied once the wheat gets close to jointing in the spring. Herbicides containing dicamba include Banvel, Clarity, Rave, Pulsar and Agility SG.

There has been some discussion about wheat tolerance to herbicides, especially when applied with fertilizer carrier. The best advice regarding crop safety with herbicide-fertilizer combinations and application timing is to follow the label guidelines. We generally see minimal crop injury and no yield loss from top-dress fertilizer/residual herbicide applications during the winter months. However, these combinations can often burn the wheat if applied when the crop is actively growing and with warmer weather. The foliar burn is generally temporary and wheat usually will recover if good growing conditions persist.

Research at Hays several years ago found as much as 47 percent injury to the wheat four days after treatment following a late March treatment of Amber plus 2,4-D, but wheat recovered and yields were not reduced. However, research in Nebraska did show some yield loss from Ally plus 2,4-D applications with fertilizer applied in late April to more advanced wheat and with moisture stress conditions. Crop injury with herbicide-fertilizer combinations will depend on the total amount of fertilizer applied, dilution with water, and the addition of surfactant. Again the label provides the best guidelines regarding if, when, and how herbicides can be applied with fertilizer.

With the wheat in its current state and the unknown of what types of yield you may receive, it is still best to plan to take your wheat to harvest at this time. By doing that you should plan to give the wheat its best chance to survive and thrive. Managing weeds helps eliminate competition for water and nutrients.
