State grant money restructure forces prevention center to close the Colby center and the Smoky Hill Foundation in Hays. Evans said whomever takes over that area will also have to do so with less money; $2,000 less than the center's budget for the 9 county area.

Evans said it was difficult for her agency to reach people in nine counties because of the distance involved, and it will be even harder for one agency to reach 21 counties. While no agency has won the contract yet, Evans said she wrote a letter to the state supporting the Smoky Hill Foundation, since she has collaborated with them before.

The center will officially close on Thursday, June 30, but in the meantime it is giving away a lot of its resources such as books, brochures and videos that deal with parenting, drugs, alcohol tobacco and other issues. Evans said the center has been contacting health departments and school districts, but there are still a lot of materials left. Anyone who wants to look at what they have can come by the office, she said.

Attorney general joins health care suit

"We're not out going shopping for opportunities to get engaged, but we're also keeping a watchful eye on cases as they make their way up," Schmidt said during an interview with The Associated Press.

Schmidt said the state's involvement in the lawsuits is costing his office no money and only a "nominal amount" of staff time.

"We are looking at the most strategic moves to put us in the strongest position when the issue gets before the U.S. Supreme Court," Schmidt said. "We want to help get the record fleshed out."

The federal law says Americans who don't buy health insurance and don't qualify for an exemption face paying tax penalties. Democratic President Barack Obama's administration, which pushed for the overhaul, argues that a provision of the U.S. Constitution allowing the federal government to regulate interstate commerce permits it to impose the mandate.

Schmidt and other Kansans, particularly his fellow Republicans, disagree, and this year, Kan-be compelled to buy health insurance and the policy, meant to challenge the federal mandate. However, even a few lawmakers who supported it doubt state action can trump federal law.

Wagnon compared the federal mandate to states' mandates that drivers buy auto insurance and said the requirement. She said Schmidt and other Republicans are obsessed with trying to discredit Obama and create unfounded fears about the federal health care overhaul.

"There are other things he could be doing that would benefit the public," she said. "It's pure politics. It has nothing to do with protecting people."

In the lawsuit in the District of Columbia, U.S. District Judge Gladys Kessler ruled in February that decisions not to purchase health insurance, collectively, are an economic activity that can be regulated by the federal government. Schmidt said he and the other attorneys general saw her conclusion as "so far off the mark" that they wanted to intervene.

The case's five plaintiffs, one sas legislators enacted a health from New York, one from North care "freedom" law. It takes effect Carolina and three from Texas,
