Radio lovers ham it up at airport

Saturday afternoon to Sunday morning.

McLemore said all of amateur radio communications they are involved with are completed with generators and emergency power. He said that during a disaster when power is not available or are overloaded, "ham" radio is the most reliable.

The Trojan Ham Radio Club members are also part of the Northwest Kansas Incident Management Team.

Each team member has a "go bag" packed with toiletries and anything else they may need for at least two days. If there is a disaster or an emergency, the team has two hours from the time they are called upon to deploy and be on the road.

"When we deploy, there are usually three guys in the advance party who go and make sure the team is really necessary," explained McLemore. "In addition to our go bags, we also have a trailer that acts as a mobile office for deployment."

Working alongside emergency management, the American Red Cross, local law enforcement and fire departments, the team maintains a specific role of communicating information to necessary parties during a crisis.

"About 10 years ago Mike Albers and I helped with a tornado in Hoisington and my first (deployment) was when I was a student at K-State in 1973.

There was a tornado in Clay Center," Frahm said.

Frahm said he learned about Morse Code from Dale "Doc" Fleckenstein, a well-known dentist of Colby from the 1950's to 80's.

"It gets really exciting when you get into the high-frequencies, which are the ones that go further," Frahm said. "If the ionosphere and all the circumstances are right you can even make contact with other continents."

He went on to explain that there are various factors about the energy in the ionosphere, temperature, the sun and other components that effect how well radio can be transmitted.

For example, Frahm said that if he wanted to contact Japan, the best time would be in the early morning during summer. He said this is a peak time of day in Japan when a lot of people are awake and the lower bands that are transmitted equal less energy which may obstruct radio contact.

"This is a fun hobby for us and we personally provide most of the equipment you see here," McLemore said. "All it takes to be a member is to have an amateur radio license and Bruce, Mike, Nathan and I are all testers and can certify anyone interested."

The Trojan Ham Radio Club participates in about four competitions a year and encourage interested persons to contact team members for information about the club and what they do.

Department, who said they had located and recovered Murray Enterprises' stolen Jeep. It was located at the Petro Stopping Center, 2123 N. Ninth St. in Salina. Police had been called to this address for a report of a different stolen vehicle and found the Grand Cherokee while investigating their stolen vehicle report.

The stolen vehicle in Salina was a 2010 Chevrolet HHR which was taken right after the driver, Conrad Kraft, had filled the gas tank.

Kraft had left the keys in the ignition of the vehicle, which was owned by Gonzales Communications of Lenexa, while he filled the tank, Capt. Mike Sweeney of the Salina Police Department told the Salina Journal.

The Colby and Salina Police Departments are investigating the incidents.

Asteroid's near miss comes later than expected

WASHINGTON (AP) – An asteroid coming within cosmic kissing distance of Earth was a little late for its date with our planet. But there was still no chance of it hitting Earth.

New observations this morning had astronomers saying the asteroid, called 2011 MD, wouldn't swing close by Earth until noon (Central Time) today, about three and-a-half hours later than they first thought. It wouldn't come as close either. It passed by about 7,600 miles from Earth, 100 miles further than first forecast.

The asteroid is between 15 feet and 60 feet wide. It was bright enough a medium-sized telescope might be able to see it.

Earlier this year a smaller space rock came within 3,400 miles of Earth.

State tightens grip on abortion Friday day state inspection last week, and an inspection of the Women's Health Center, also in Overland Park, is set to start Wednesday.

The health department rejected a license for the Aid for Women clinic in Kansas City, Kan., without an inspection, based on information it included in its application. Abortion rights supporters fear the other two providers won't get licenses either, however their inspections turn out.

"The right to abortion services in Kansas is at stake," said Cheryl Pilate, Aid for Women's attorney.

The health department regulates more than 230 hospitals and ambulatory surgical centers, which include the Planned Parenthood clinic. The state's other two abortion providers are among dozens of other offices and clinics falling under rules for office-based surgeries set by the State Board of Healing Arts, which regulates physicians.

Pilate said Aid for Women disclosed in its application that its clinic needs extensive renovations to comply with the health department regulations for abortion providers.

The health department's regulations for hospitals and surgical centers don't include specific room sizes. Instead, they're tied to standards from the American Institute of Architects for medical facilities, which call for at least 360 square feet of unrestricted space for surgery rooms. But those standards apply to new construction.

Specific room-temperature requirements don't appear in the standards for hospitals, surgical centers or office-based surgery sites. For abortion providers, the regulations even differ for procedure rooms and recovery rooms, where the temperature must be between 70 degrees and 75 degrees.

Joseph Kroll, the director of the health department bureau that drafted the regulations, said it tried to set a "gold standard" for patients.

But abortion rights supporters contend the real goal is to keep existing providers from performing abortions and to make it impossible for doctors to open new abortion clinics.

"The state of Kansas has taken itself to shut down abortion providers," said Julie Burkhart, founder of the political action committee Trust Women.

Mary Kay Culp, executive director of the anti-abortion group Kansans for Life, said the Kansas regulations draw on standards set by the National Abortion Federation, the professional association for providers.

"If they are the model medical clinics they always claimed they are, these regulations should not be a problem," Culp said.

The federation's latest clinical policy guidelines touch on some of the same subjects as the new Kansas regulations, such as controlling infections and managing medical risks. They also recommend drugs and equipment to be used in particular circumstances.

But the federation's guidelines focus more on individual procedures and don't discuss clinic buildings. In standards for post-operative care, the federation says patients can't be discharged until they are mobile, their pulse and blood pressure are stable and their pain and bleeding are under control. But the standards don't set a minimum time in the recovery room.

The health department's standards for surgical centers also don't set a minimum recovery time. They say a patient who has received anesthesia "shall be discharged in the company of a responsible adult," though the attending physician can waive the requirement.

There is no specific recovery-time guideline in the office-based surgery rules, either.

Providers and abortion rights advocates equate first-trimester abortions – the vast majority of those performed in Kansas – with other, minor office-based procedures. Dr. Herbert Hodes, who performs abortions at the Women's Health Center, said the most common procedure there can be done in 2 minutes or less.

"It's certainly less complicated than pulling all four wisdom teeth," he said.

But a conflicting view of abortion led the backers of the new regulations to push for the law under which they were drafted. And Kansas will have significantly different rules for abortion providers than for physicians performing other office-based surgeries, or for surgical centers and hospitals.
