Weird crimes mark state’s 2011 roundup

By Lynne Tuohy
Associated Press

CONCORD, N.H. (AP) – From thefts of maple syrup to grave markers, snowplow blades and sunglasses, police in New Hampshire dealt with an array of weird crimes in 2011.
Some were brazen, some just plain inexplicable.
Among the former was a man’s attempt to sell a stolen bicycle to a uniformed officer in Manchester in September. The officer had approached the man to investigate a report of a bike that was chained outside a pawn shop being stolen, police say. They say when the officer approached the man, he offered to sell him the bicycle for $50.

Another man rolled across the hood of a car to rob a customer making a night deposit through his driver’s side window at a Conway bank drive-up in November.
A Londonderry man was sentenced to a month in prison in October, after aiming a .45-caliber handgun at two men who came to repossess his truck.
“That one’s unique,” said Rockingham County Assistant Attorney Brad Bolton, who argued for a stiffer sentence for 51-year-old James Pincence.
Among the more baffling thefts were snowplow blades, firewood and generators, all reported missing to Merrimack police in recent months.
