Police need warrant for tracking

most offenses impinges on expectations of privacy," Alito wrote in an opinion joined by Justices Ruth Bader Ginsburg, Stephen Breyer and Elena Kagan. Sotomayor in her concurring opinion specifically said she agreed with Alito on this conclusion.

Alito added, "We need not identify with precision the point at which the tracking of this vehicle became a search, for the line was surely crossed before the four-week mark."

Regarding the issue of duration, Scalia wrote that "we may have to grapple" with those issues in the future, "but there is no reason for rushing forward to resolve them here."

Alito also said the court should address how expectations of privacy affect whether warrants are required for remote surveillance using electronic methods that do not require the police to install equipment, such as GPS tracking of mobile telephones.

A federal appeals court in Washington had overturned Jones's drug conspiracy conviction because police did not have a warrant when they installed a GPS device on his vehicle and then tracked his movements for a month. The Supreme Court agreed with the appeals court.

The case is U.S. v. Jones, 10-1259.

Secretary of State's plan still has issues

By John Hanna
AP Political Writer

TOPEKA — Secretary of State Kris Kobach is tired of excuses. He says educational television ads are ready, free copies of birth certificates are available, and a state computer upgrade should be done in time to require that all new Kansas voters show proof of U.S. citizenship — ahead of the presidential elections.

Kobach and his supporters, mostly fellow conservative Republicans, have been fighting to get the new law to take effect in June instead of next January, and this week he'll take his case to the Legislature.

Critics have been fighting back, initially against the overall law but now honing on its implementation: How will new voters learn about the changes? Who should pay for newly required documents? And will a $40 million state computer upgrade be finished in time to allow for the electronic transfer of passports, birth certificates and other vital documents?

But some questions are raising concerns among new critics, including moderate Republicans. Last week, as legislators dug into details of the law, questions also surfaced about whether poor residents would be required to pay for copies of their vital records.

The House Elections Committee plans to hold a hearing Wednesday on Kobach's proposal to make June 15 the effective date when people who register to vote for the first time in Kansas must provide proof of their citizenship. There's a good chance the plan will ultimately be approved by the House, where conservative Republicans hold a majority, but there could be enough opposition in the Senate to block the plan.

Kobach argues that the requirement will keep illegal immigrants from registering to vote as part of a broader effort to combat election fraud. A former University of Missouri-Kansas City law professor, Kobach is known nationally for advising officials in other states about cracking down on illegal immigration, and he helped draft tough laws in Alabama and Arizona.
