approach to conserving water.

While it's not a solution to overuse of water in designated Intensive Groundwater Use Control Areas, he said, it adds public input to a process where the chief engineer was given the power to implement corrective provisions.

According to the department's website, the engineer could implement these provisions in areas where it is determined, through a public hearing, that groundwater levels are declining rapidly, groundwater withdrawals exceeds the rate of recharge, unreasonable deterioration of groundwater quality has or may occur, or other conditions exist warranting additional regulation to protect public interest.

Bossert said this process does not allow for as much public input as Kansas residents by the state is far off from the its original would like.

The new process begins with asking the water users and others from six high-priority zones in northwest Kansas to develop a plan, submit it to the district board, which then submits it to the chief engineer. The engineer can either approve it, reject it or send it back to the district board for changes that have come up during the hearing process.

The high-priority zones include two in Thomas County, two in Sherman and one each in Sheridan and Cheyenne.

Once the engineer has the final plan, he said, it would go through a two-hearing process to get it implemented.

"Locals may not get what they want, but they're guaranteed not to get what they don't want," Bossert said.

The group has a veto if the plan accepted they can do this if they want.

goals, he added.

The bill was introduced in January. It passed 40-0 in the Senate and 123-1 in the House.

Gov. Brownback has already signed the bill, so tomorrow's event is just a ceremonial signing, Bossert said. The actual law went into effect when it was published in the Kansas Register on April 12.

Bossert said the entire process could take six or seven months, and it's up to the stakeholders when they want to start it.

He said the Sheridan County high-priority zone wants to implement its plan next year, so the goal is to have it done by February, before farmers start making plans.

"Other counties can start the process now or not," Bossert said. "It's a process where

Senator bent out of shape over map with a low around 43. South wind

The 36th was held by long-time Sen. Janis Lee, who resigned to take a job with the state Board of Tax Appeals. She was replaced by Sen. Allen Schmidt. Both are Democrats, and the district includes Democrat-leaning Ellis County.

The House, the Senate and the state's four congressional districts have to be redrawn this year, using population figures from the 2010 Census. The latest congressional map passed the House, Sen. Ostmeyer said; it would split Topeka, and put the urban part in with the rural 1st District.

The House put its redistricting map in the same bill, which was rejected in the Senate, he added, and that left things up in the air.

"We're really in quite a disarray," the senator said, noting that the Senate it split three ways with eight Democrats and 14 or so "moderate" Republicans and 14 hardcore conservatives. The Democrats vote with the left-wing Republicans when they see an advantage. The House is much more conservative.

The districts have to be drawn and the to Topeka this week, Sen. Ostmeyer said.

"That'll be the first order of business when we go back," he said.

On other bills, he said a threat to put home-owned carnivals back under state regulation failed in committee.

"Norton had an accident last year," he said. "It wasn't serious at all. It didn't seem to me to be any problem."

However, the secretary of labor, former Sen. Karin Brownlee, put forth a bill to regulate the community-run carnivals. It took a personal appeal to Gov. Sam Brownback to get things turned around, Ostmeyer said.

He said he hopes the secretary, who is from Johnson County, will come out and visit some of the carnivals this year.

Starting this year, he said, home-owned carnivals will have to provide the state with a certificate of insurance, but won't be inspected.

A move to resume charging senior citizens for hunting and fishing licenses has been scaled back, he said. With the population getting older, he said, the Department of Wildlife, Parks and Tourism simply can't afford to exempt everyone over 65, but as the bill was amended, people 65 to 74 will ment for full federal money for each license sold, he said.

"I'm willing to do that as a 68-year-old," he said, adding that with the cost of going hunting, "the license would be the cheapest thing you'd have."

Agreement on the budget, he said, fell apart because the House wanted to cut transportation to make up for money added to education.

The senator said he was "disappointed" that Chief Justice Lawton Nuss had chosen to start "furlough days" for state court workers because of the budget standoff. He said the move could only hurt salaried court workers, who will lose at least two days of pay.

"He knows that the process hasn't really gone to pot," Sen. Ostmeyer said. "The person who has a job will be hurt. I'm bothered by that."

He said a constitutional amendment to prevent schools and other agencies from using state money to sue the Legislature had failed in the House and won't come up in the Senate, the senator said.
