Chiefs open minicamp without star

By Dave Skretta

AP Sports Writer
KANSAS CITY, Mo. – Chiefs offensive coordinator Brian Daboll stood in the middle of a practice field barking instructions at quarterback Matt Cassel, who proceeded to drop back and throw a perfect pass to Jonathan Baldwin.

For the time being, his No. 1 wide receiver.

The Chiefs opened their mandatory three-day minicamp Tuesday without wide receiver Dwayne Bowe, who has not yet signed his franchise tender. That means Bowe is not under contract, and technically is exempt from the last series of workouts before training camp in late July.

There was no defining “eventually” – could be later this week, could be the start of camp in St. Joseph, Mo., and it could be just before the start of the regular season.

The only thing that’s certain is that Bowe will be playing catch-up when he arrives and has to learn the new offense being installed by Daboll, who replaced Bill Muir as offensive coordinator.

Kansas City has otherwise had perfect attendance at just about every workout, voluntary and mandatory alike, allowing the Chiefs to quickly pick up Daboll’s system.

While there are some similar elements to what the Chiefs ran under Muir and Todd Haley, their previous head coach, there are enough differences that wide receiver Dexter McCluster said at one point that his “head was spinning.”

Bowe is coming off a season in which he caught 81 passes for 1,159 and five TDs from a patchwork group of quarterbacks. He’s caught 356 passes for 4,927 yards and 36 touchdowns in his five-year career, even making his first Pro Bowl two years ago.

His franchise tender is valued at $9.5 million.

Bowe’s absence has meant more repetitions with the first team for Baldwin, who has made significant strides during his first full offseason.
