"I've been fishing around to find a suitable alternative. The deputies prefer to go somewhere else, but the problem with that is putting inmates in a car and bringing them to court. It'd be more convenient to have it all in one judicial center with court services officers, county attorney, offices for judges, secretaries, court reporters and other people, because it is a separate, but equal, arm of government.

"So, at the end of the month, for the project."

"Our goal is to do what's best for us and the people of Thomas County," said Standage. "We've looked to see if the options are relevant, if there's value in it and how to maintain a sustainable program.

"We've had conversations with Golden Prairie to evaluate that alternative, and we've sized each other up to see what's in common. We feel like what's currently being done at the Golden Prairie District is more in line with Thomas County, compared to Rawlins County.

"Based on information we have at this time, we feel like that would be a better decision. Now, I'm not saying that making a partnership work with Rawlins County would be impossible, but it would be more of a challenge."

"Your reasons are understandable," said Cox. "We need to do what's best for us, Thomas County. It makes sense for us."

Later on, Commissioner Paul Steele said that when he drives around town he sees a lot of Rawlins County cars here with people supporting our businesses and he'd like I don't think K-State will agree to anything to see an alliance work with our northern less. neighbors.

Conversations led to determining what the property tax levy would be if a merge took place, since the tax is a major revenue source for Extension offices. Thomas County has appropriated $136,000, with a levy of 1.254 mills, for next year.

According to the law, said Chris Onstad, K-State Research and Extension northwest area director, an agreement to form a district can specify a levy limit as high as 2.5 mills. Onstad speculated that K-State would not agree to anything less.

Commissioners agreed they were not comfortable with allowing a 2.5 mill cap, nearly double the current tax.

would have the option of going to 2.5 mills too, which is why we want to partner with if needed," Onstad said, "but likely would stay lower. These people are not out to raise money

"I want to practice the existing law to what the state Legislature put into place and Standage agreed: "It's important to remember that board members are also property owners in the community. They'd have to take responsibility to not waste tax dollars." he said.

"But when you need 2.5 mills, our people won't be able to pay it because it'll come in tough times," said Steele. "We'd be better sold if the cap was set at 1.5 mills and a partnership with Rawlins County was considered at the same time. We are sympathetic to our colleagues in Rawlins and we don't want to leave them high and dry.'

No one made a motion on forming a district or joining one. Commissioners directed the Extension staff to propose their sugges-"By agreeing to this cap, the district tions of setting a 1.5 mill cap and partnering with Rawlins to K-State. No date was set to continue the discussion.
