Old St. Thomas Hospital recognized by register

The federal credit, offered through the National Park Service, covers up to 20 percent and requires that a project be income-producing, as well as meet a set of 10 government standards.

Spencer Preservation, a historic preservation firm hired by Cohen Esery, nominated the hospital for the national register on July 6. On Nov. 3 it was added to the state historical society's register of historic places, and Sarah Martin, National Register coordinator for the society, filed the paperwork to add it to the national register that

The first half of the building was constructed through the Works Projects Administration in 1941, and the second half, including a chapel and wing for polio patients, was added in 1948. Brenda Spencer, owner of Spencer Preservation, described the building as typical of the time an place where it was built. She said that architect Joseph Radotinsky, who designed the original building, worked on several buildings in west Kansas, including the high school in Oberlin.

Citizens' Medical Center was dedicated in 1982 and replaced the old hospital. The Colby School District used the building for office space in the 1980s and 1990s before it fell out of use.

Five other sites in the state, including another hospital building in Kansas City, were entered onto the national register on Jan. 2. Two buildings were taken off the register, including the Krueger Opera House in Hays, which was demolished in United for Separation of Church and State disagreed with Schroeder's interpretation.

"Why would you have in the Constitution the fact that the government can't interfere with religion, but religion can interfere with the government?" said Vickie Sandell Stangl. "How does that protect the government? How does that make a stable society if it's not a two-way street? That does not create a stable society. That would be my answer to them on that.'

The bill also would allow religious displays in public schools, although they must be connected to a course of study that "does not favor or disfavor any religion or religious belief," according to written testimony from Mark Hallman, spokesman for the Kansas Association of Public Schools.

House Majority Leader Arlen Siegfried, R-Olathe, said he expects the chamber to vote on the bill next week. He said he believes the bill is

"I do not believe that having a cross on a sign forces an atheist to be a believer," Siegfried says. "I just don't believe that."
