Board learns state aid stable

the school needs officials and would be willing to train anyone who wants to sign up.

• Jeff Wallingford, the high school principal, said the staff are finishing up their work now; the last of the students checked out on May 21, allowing all the staff to wind down.

There was an end-of-year potluck for the teachers, an eighth grade transition meeting and a meeting for teaching standards May 17 and 20 and a common core standards meeting on May 22 and 23. There will be an in-service training for teachers to learn to co-teach, he said, and maintenance projects throughout the summer.

There will be a test run training and various projects around the school this summer.

• Curriculum Director Diana Wieland also mentioned a co-teaching conference that will involve most of the staff. She reported that over three quarters of the staff have signed up for the "iConnect iLearn" conference on technology education that was held Thursday and today, and another conference to cover English language arts and math on Tuesday. Wieland pointed out the standards are being backed up by businesses and not just the government.

She said staff will participate in training to teach English as a second language, sponsored by the Southwest Plains Service Center. She also spent a day last week working with the tech committee learning about teaching kids to work with computers.

• The board approved resignations for Richard Britton as transportation director, Brenda Rose as a second grade teacher and Thesia Weber as a fifth grade teacher. It approved employment recommendations for Alicia Albers as a grade school teacher, Travis Betz as a high school language arts teacher, Kevin Brown as a high school social studies teacher and Wade Weaver as a custodian.

Finally, it approved supplemental contracts for Ryan Becker as the head coach of the high school girls' basketball team, Brown as the head coach of the boys' basketball team, Betz as the assistant coach for the football and boys' basketball teams, Jon McKee as the assistant coach for the girls' basketball team, Paige Gawith as the debate coach and Nancy Rundel as the scholars' bowl coach.

Is Big Data now 'Big Brother?'

doesn't mean the information can't be tied to other data coming in through the PRISM program to look into people's lives, according to experts.

Like pieces of a puzzle, the bits and bytes left from people's electronic interactions can be cobbled together to draw conclusions about their friendships and preferences using data-mining formulas and increasingly powerful computers.

It's all part of a phenomenon known as "Big Data," a catchphrase increasingly used to describe the science of analyzing the vast amount of information collected through mobile devices, Web browsers and check-out stands. Analysts use powerful computers to detect trends and create digital dossiers about people.

The Obama administration and lawmakers privy to the NSA's surveillance say the data being collected is only dissected when there is credible evidence of a terrorist plot or other reasons to believe that national security is being threatened. The sweeping court order covers the Verizon records of every mobile and landline phone call from April 25 through July 19, according to The Guardian.

It's likely the Verizon phone records are being matched with an even broader set of data, said Forrester Research analyst Fatiemeh Khatibloo.

"My sense is they are looking for network patterns," she said. "They are looking for who is connected to whom and whether they can put any timelines together. They are also probably trying to identify locations where people are calling from."

The Verizon data includes the duration of every call. Although the court order doesn't require it, experts suspect the NSA may also be getting some kind of data that helps determine the vicinity of the calls.

The location information is particularly valuable for cloak-and-dagger operations like the one the NSA is running, said Cindy Cohn, a legal director for the Electronic Frontier Foundation, a digital rights group that has been fighting the government's collection of personal phone records since 2006. The foundation is currently suing over the government's collection of U.S. citizens' communications in a case that dates back to the administration of President George W. Bush.

"It's incredibly invasive," Cohn said. "This is a consequence of the fact that we have so many third parties that have accumulated significant information about our everyday lives."

It's such a rich vein of information that U.S. companies and other organizations now spend more than $2 billion each year to obtain third-party data about individuals, according to Forrester Research. The data helps businesses target potential customers. Much of this information is sold by so-called data brokers such as Acxiom Corp., a Little Rock, Ark., company that maintains extensive files about the online and offline activities of more than 500 million consumers worldwide.

The digital floodgates have opened during the past decade as the convenience and allure of the Internet — and smartphones — have made it easier and more enjoyable for people to stay connected wherever they go.

"I don't think there has been a sea change in analytical methods as much as there has been a change in the volume, velocity and variety of information and the computing power to process it all," said Gartner analyst Douglas Laney.

In a sign of the NSA's determination to vacuum up as much data as possible, the agency has built a data center in Bluffdale, Utah that is five times larger than the U.S. Capitol — all to sift through Big Data. The massive center has fed perceptions that some factions of the U.S. government are determined to build a database of all phone calls, Internet searches and emails under the guise of national security.
