

‘Respect Ride’ across America protests youth violence

Two bike riders crossed through Goodland Tuesday on a 3,660-mile ride across the United States to protest youth violence.

The riders are the founders of the Respect Ride across America, a team comprising five college students giving their summer to the prevention of youth violence.

They will be stopping in towns across the United States to meet with students in summer schools, camps and activity groups to teach them about healthy ways to deal with anger and leadership.

Their ride is billed as a “significant connecting all of America in a solution to the problem.”

The trip started in Virginia on June 12. The total trip will take 10 weeks to complete. They will ride through Columbus, Chicago, Kansas City, Denver, Salt Lake City, Carson City and San Francisco. Targeting a diverse cross-section of communities both big and small.

The two riders are Matthew Daggett, a student in the Social Studies Honor Program at Harvard University, and Mark Peterson, a student at the University of Dayton. Peterson describes himself as an avid cyclist and adventure athlete, and says he is excited to participate in this ride.

Conor Gaughan was also a founder of the ride. He grew up near Littleton, Colo., and the Columbine High School shootings there hit close to home. After the shootings, he was inspired to start the ride. He is the business manager of the trip.

The route will take the riders from Washington to San Francisco, with a stop in Burlington on Tuesday night, and a two day stay in Denver after that.

Matthew Daggett and Mark Peterson ride down Old U.S. 24 towards Burlington on Tuesday as part of the Respect Ride (right). A chaser van carries the other three members of the respect team, and keeps traffic aware of the bikers (far right). The van also has a banner announcing the ride and containing its web address.
