Huffing causes psychological ills

By the time a student reaches the eighth grade, one in five of his or her peers will have used inhalants to get high.

Many young people will become chronic users and require treatment and chemical dependence therapy. Unfortunately, demand for facilities that treat solvent addiction greatly outweighs supply. Chronic inhalant users can and do slip through the cracks.

Why have inhalant abusers become a “throw-away” population? Few facilities have experience in treating the compounded medical, neurological and psychological disorders associated with chronic huffers. Furthermore, inhalant abuse is a problem that is largely undertreated by the managed care industry, understudied by the substance abuse field and overlooked by parents.

Chronic users do not fit the mold of most drug abuse populations, says Mark Groves, director of the Minneapolis-based Eden Youth Inhalant Abuse and Information Training Project and author of Preventing Inhalant Abuse: A Training Manual. Users are younger, often delinquent, and can suffer a multitude of medical, psychological and social dysfunction brought on by the chemicals they have sniffed or huffed.

“Because of the damage neurotoxic chemicals cause to the brain,” Groves said, “I think it is wise to consider the regular, chronic inhalant abuser as having a mental health problem rather than a chemical dependency problem.”

Lewis Patten

Brewster man celebrates 90th

In honor of Lewis Patten's 90th birthday on July 12, 2001, the family would like to request a card shower.

They are asking that people send cards and a memory, if possible, to Lewis Patten, 252 County Rd. X, Brewster, Kan. 67732.

Internet Tonight—call 899-2338.

While much of the neurological damage from inhalant use is reversible, the process of breaking the chemical dependency and treating the physical and psychological ill-effects of inhalant use takes considerable time. The typical 28-day stay allotted by insurance companies for treatment is inadequate. Experts say it may take at least that amount of time just to get the user ready to engage in therapy.

“Because neurotoxins are stored in the fatty tissue of the body, the inhalant abuser may experience residual effects for sometime,” Groves said. “This could include affect and dullness of intellectual functioning.”

Detoxification can take 20 to 30 days and often times much longer. After that, users need either residential treatment or extensive outpatient therapy, often over a year of services and counseling. Insurance companies, however, generally cover just 3 to 5 days of crisis stabilization in a residential setting and approximately 20 days of follow-up outpatient services. While some health care providers offer lengthier terms of stay, few provide coverage of the long-term patient and family therapy that is necessary to rehabilitate corrections

A real estate transfer listed in the matters of record of Tuesday's Goodland Daily News, incorrectly stated David A. and Nancy L. Walker of Goodland to Larry J. and Naniel Williams of the Sunflowers USA Association an irregular tract in the SW 1/4 of Sec. 20, T8S, R39W. It should have read: David A. and Nancy L.
