Broadening Kansas horizons with broadband

The truth is out there, Kansas: the future of our state depends upon the affordable, dependable delivery of advanced telecommunications services to all of our state's communities, regardless of size or location.

So, what is an "advanced telecommunications service"? It boils down to one word: Broadband — high-speed access to the Internet. If today's dial-up access is sipping information through a straw, then broadband access is like guzzling it through a firehose.

As we continue on into the Information Age, that data "guzzling" will be a necessity for growth and competitiveness in the global economy. Kansas is going to need broadband to succeed and prosper — which is why SBC Southwestern Bell is working to deliver it throughout our state.

Fortunately, several technologies for obtaining high-speed Internet access are available today, including Digital Subscriber Line (DSL), satellite and cable modem. Kansans deserve broadband access through the technology that best meets their individual needs.

Unfortunately, current laws discourage the type of investment that our telecom network needs to support widespread broadband delivery. The regulations governing service providers are inconsistent; there are different rules for different technologies — and that prevents fair and open competition.

The rules should be the same for all service providers, to foster as much competition as possible. More competition means more choices and better value for customers. And regulatory resources should be dedicated to protecting consumers, ensuring service quality and holding telecommunications companies to their promises.

With the right changes to our laws, companies will invest, broadband will flourish and Kansas will continue to grow and succeed. Together, we will prosper.
