K-State vet discusses Anthrax issues

dana belshe

• ag notebook

Laboratory will diagnose an occasional case, perhaps once every couple of years although they have never diagnosed it in animals other than cattle. When it occurs, it is usually suspected by the local veterinarian and then specimens are submitted to the diagnostic lab for confirmation. Most cases seem to occur in the Northwest part of the state. There are other areas around the country and the world where it tends to be more common than in other areas.

These are called endemic areas. But even in these endemic areas, the disease might go years without occurring and then there may be an outbreak following something like a flood or drought and high winds that would stir up the dirt and expose the buried spores.

Construction for new buildings where the soil is disturbed can also start outbreaks in endemic areas.

How is anthrax transmitted from livestock to people?

It can be transmitted by contaminated fluids or tissues contacting open wounds. It can also be transmitted from animals to people by ingesting contaminated meat from an infected animal, but this is rare. Contaminated objects or products from animals such as hides, wool, and bone meal can also be sources of infection for people.

There have been cases where contaminated bristles on shaving brushes caused the disease in people. Biting insects are also a potential transmitter. Not because the insects get the disease, but just by carrying contaminated blood or fluids from an animal dead from the disease to the open wound of a person. The pulmonary form in people is rarely, if ever, the result of transmission from infected animals, but usually from airborne particles such as from contaminated dust or airborne particles from other sources. People do not contract the disease from other people and there is minimal danger from caring for or being around people ill with anthrax. The most common form in people is the cutaneous form, where an open wound has been contaminated. This forms chronic festering sores or pustules.

What can people do to protect themselves?

The best protection is simply good hygiene. Being careful around sick animals, particularly in endemic areas or where previous cases in animals have occurred. One should always bury or burn animals dead from suspected anthrax. If veterinarians suspect an animal to have anthrax, they usually will not autopsy the animal, but rather take a specimen of blood to send into a laboratory for confirmation. This is an attempt to minimize contamination of the soil.

What can people do to protect their livestock?

Again, good hygiene and seeking veterinary assistance to diagnose dead or dying livestock. There is a vaccine available, but it is not recommended unless an outbreak is occurring. In some states, such as Kansas where the disease is rare, a livestock producer has to have permission from the Livestock Commissioner to vaccinate his or her animals. This is because the vaccine itself is composed of a live, but weakened anthrax organism, but it can still potentially contaminate the soil.

How is it treated?

If diagnosed early, a number of different antibiotics will kill the organism. In the pulmonary form, it is treatable in the early stages, but once the bacteria have become disseminated in the body and there has been extensive damage in the lungs, antibiotic treatment is usually futile.
