Stalking makes victims fear for safety

Stalking — it can make you live in fear.

Stalking is a series of acts by another person that harass you and make you fear for your safety. A stalker often tries to control a person by keeping him or her in a state of constant fear.

Stalking is all too common. Most victims are women, but men and children can be stalked as well. It happens to people of all racial and ethnic groups.

People stalk others for different reasons. The stalker may be someone with whom you shared your life, a former or current boyfriend, girlfriend or spouse.

The person may start stalking to keep you in a relationship that you have ended or are trying to end, or to "get even" with you for leaving or rejecting him or her. The latter is the most common kind of stalker. Most often, the person was abusive during the relationship.

A stalker can also be a casual acquaintance or a complete stranger. This may be an obsessed admirer who wants to be in a relationship with you. The attention may flatter you at first — until the person won't take no for an answer.

Stalking often follows a pattern. It may start with unwanted attention. The person may keep trying to be a part of your life, even after you tell him or her to leave you alone. The person may keep calling or leaving messages and sending unwanted letters, e-mail or gifts. The stalker may follow you often, show up at your home or work place uninvited or spy on you.

It can become more dangerous. Over time, the stalker may increase the harassment and put you in danger. He or she may make threats against you or your loved ones or make comments taken as threats, break into your home, damage your property or try to harm you. There is no way to tell if a stalker will become violent.

Help keep as much evidence as possible, such as:

- Messages on your answering machine.
- A journal of every time the stalker bothers you.
- Threatening or disturbed notes or e-mail.
- Photos of any injuries or damage caused by the stalker.
- Names and phone numbers of any witnesses.

Getting a restraining order allows law enforcement to arrest the stalker if he or she comes near you, though it does not guarantee the stalker will stay away. He or she may even increase the stalking. Talk to a victims' advocate about the risks and benefits of getting a restraining order.

Make your personal safety a daily habit by parking in well-lit areas and varying your routines and routes. Don't give out your home address and telephone number. If the stalker approaches you while your in your car, drive to the nearest law enforcement agency.

Don't try to reason or plead. Face to face attention is what the stalker wants. It will only encourage him or her to continue to stalk you or put you in more danger.

Tell family, trusted friends and neighbors about the situation. Ask them to be on the lookout. Have them call police if they spot the person around your home or workplace.

If you would like to know more about a restraining order or other information regarding stalking call the Northwest Kansas Family Shelter at 1-800-794-4624 or 785-625-3055. The Regional Prevention Center also has informational folders regarding violence. You may call 785-899-3848 or come by 109 W. 11th.
