them to learn more about Sherman County elected officials, beyond what they read in the newspaper.

"I knew a little bit about a lot of things," said Jan Lohr, who works at First National Bank, "but I never got the opportunity to see behind the scenes."

Linin said she realized that people run for leadership positions because they genuinely want to make a difference.

"I saw how many people really want the best for Goodland," she said.

Christie Rasure, wife of county commissioner Kevin Rasure, said she saw that Goodland is able to support a big business, but people need to work to bring one in.

"We just need to find the right one," she said.

Lohr said the city can capitalize on its location near Denver.

"The gateway to the front range," she said.

Bryce Cole, a former class member, is co-chairman of the 10-member board that runs the program. The board comprises six former class members and for at-large members.

Cole said every year two class members are picked to serve on the board for three years. In the third year, he said, those members will head the board.

The class was developed six years ago by people who had participated in similar courses elsewhere, he said, and is based on the Leadership Kansas program.

Business, organizations and individuals nominate class members, Cole said, and a group separate from the board picks 10 class members based on applications they submit.

He said the purpose isn't to create leaders, but to educate those who already have leadership qualities.

"You meet people, make connections and see a side of Sherman County you've never seen before," he said.

Abortion not top issue for leaders

TOPEKA (AP) — Senate leaders aren't making abortion-related bills a high priority, even though abortion opponents in the House have sent over three proposals.

A fourth bill, allowing the state to issue "Choose Life" license plates, went to Gov. Bill Graves after Wednesday's series of House votes.

One measure approved by House members would require the secretary of health and environment to establish minimum health and staffing standards for abortion clinics.

Another bill amends a 1992 law requiring doctors to notify a parent or guardian when a minor seeks an abortion.

The bill specifies that the notice be given in person or by certified mail.

A third measure makes it a crime to injure or kill a fetus, except for an abortion. But abortion opponents see declaring that a fetus is a human worthy of protection as an important statement to make in the criminal code.

Top Senate leaders said they have not reviewed the three bills and are concentrating on legislation closing the state's $700 million budget gap.

"We have a $700 million hole, and that will have my attention," said Senate Majority Leader Lana Oleen, R-Manhattan.

Wednesday was the 80th calendar day of the session, out of 90 scheduled.

"I presume our preoccupation will be the budget, and these bills may get lost in the shuffle," said Senate Minority Leader Anthony Hensley, D-Topeka.

Sen. Nancy Harrington, an abortion opponent who chairs the Senate Federal and State Affairs Committee, said senators still can consider the bills.

"All sorts of things get done at the last moment," said Harrington, R-Goddard.

Senate passes research center package

TOPEKA (AP) — A bill financing construction of research centers at three universities and improvements to an aviation institute in Wichita easily won Senate approval Wednesday.

Passed on a 37-3 vote, the bill authorizes the Board of Regents to issue up to $130 million in bonds for research centers on biomedicine at the University of Kansas, food safety at Kansas

State University and aviation at Wichita State University. Federal grants would finance the centers' operations.

Voting against the bill were Republican Sens. Tim Huelskamp of Fowler, Bob Lyon of Winchester and Kay O'Connor of Olathe.

The House earlier approved the bill but with a smaller price tag.

A Senate committee amended the measure to raise the bonding limit to $130 million and provide $13 million in bonds for improvements at the National Institute for Aviation Research at Wichita State.

If the House does not accept the amended bill, the differences will be worked out by a joint conference committee.

Employment rising

nation's temp firms is significant as the country begins to recover from recession. Businesses, hesitant to hire new full-time employees, turn to temporary hires.

"It's not the tidal wave that we're waiting for and that we'd like to see," John Boone, chief executive of the Portland, Ore., temporary staffing firm Employment Trends Inc., said recently. "But the tide is rising."

U.S. businesses started adding jobs in February for the first time in seven months, helping push down the unemployment rate to 5.5 percent. Economists declared the yearlong recession over.

Temp firms were hit especially hard during the recession as they lost almost 500,000 jobs. Demand for workers in health care, finance and manufacturing started picking up for Troy, Mich.-based Kelly Services in February. Boone's Oregon company saw activity last month in most fields.

"We started getting a broad base of orders from all different clients," he said. "We've been waiting for this for a long time."

The end of the recession and payroll increases do not mean jobseekers are in the driver's seat. Economists say companies will remain skittish about hiring back workers until a full economic recovery has appeared, possibly at year's end or next year.

That means the unemployment rate still could rise before leveling off, some analysts say to 6 percent or more. Analysts are forecasting a 5.6 percent rate for March and 50,000 new jobs; the indicator is being released Friday.

New claims for unemployment insurance shot up last week by 64,000 to 460,000 — the highest level since the beginning of December, the Labor Department said Thursday. But the layoffs picture was distorted by a federal deadline for people to seek extended unemployment benefits.

Job seekers may want to avoid such fields as telecommunications, general manufacturing and high tech, which may take longer to recover, economists said.

Manufacturers were suffering long before the country fell into recession, and factories have cut 1.31 million jobs in the past year. Analysts say the sector is showing signs of recovery, but they doubt that the lost jobs will be replaced anytime soon.

In high-tech, economists predict a slow comeback, with computer services picking up in the fall and possibly computer hardware manufacturing by year's end. Telecommunications shows no sign of recovery, with 60,691 job cuts announced in the first two months of the year, or 42 percent more than a year ago.

As the economy strengthens, economists think jobs will be added in retail, services and government, areas that already showed growth in February.

Jobs in health care have survived the recession, and demand is expected to get stronger as the population ages. About 126,000 nursing vacancies already exist at hospitals, a figure the industry expects to balloon to 400,000 by 2020. Demand also will grow at pharmaceutical companies, biotechnology offices and clinics.

"Nurses and pharmacists are in very short supply," said John Challenger, chief executive of job placement firm Challenger, Gray and Christmas. "Organizations can't find the people they're looking for, and they're hiring every qualified person they can find."

Government, especially local, and defense and domestic security areas also should see growth. For example, the new Transportation Security Administration is hiring 30,000 federal employees to take over passenger screening at the nation's airports.

Education is another field that will be adding jobs at all levels. Part of the growth is because of the poor economy. "A weak economy has induced people to stay in school or go back to school," said Mark Zandi, chief economist at Economy.com.

Consumers continued to spend throughout the recession, and many discount retailers have benefited, Zandi said. Stores such as Wal-Mart and Target will keep adding jobs, while some department stores could have trouble recovering, he said.

A boom in housing has kept consumers spending on items for their homes. Home furnishings retailer Pier 1 Imports is adding 100 new stores and experiencing growth at all levels, including sales, distribution centers and at corporate headquarters, said John Hughes, staffing director for the Fort Worth, Texas-based company.

"There's a great deal of expansion going on for us, and we're trying to fill jobs," he said. The company even has hired recruiters to help with hiring.

Amusement and recreation companies, hotels and airlines also are starting to rebound. Southwest Airlines will expand this year, although at a more measured rate than in the past. It plans to hire about 4,000 employees, compared with 6,000 in 2001.

Northwest Airlines plans to recall about 500 ground workers, mostly customer service agents and equipment service workers, who were laid off when the airline reduced its schedule after the Sept. 11 terror attacks.
