Children with different personalities clash

One source of friction between children is the differences in individual personality characteristics. According to Mary Kurcinka in her book “Kids, Parents and Power Struggles (2001),” some children tend to be extroverts.

That is, they seek activity and interactions and get bored easily. In comparison, introverts need more time on their own for quiet and relaxation.

Neither is a negative characteristic, but when mixed together in a family or group, these traits can result in conflicts. Parents need to learn the differences in their children’s personalities and needs and use this knowledge to the advantage of all involved.

Parents should also help their high plains mental health

- plain sense

children understand these differences. The more socially involved child needs to allow his quieter sibling some time and space of his own, and parents will need to encourage this.

Parents should try to plan family times that vary, allowing for the extrovert’s social needs and the introvert’s more relaxing activities. Both of these personality types can be sociable and benefit from playing in groups, but the extrovert will probably enjoy the group activities more.

These same personality types carry over into adulthood, and similar clashes can occur when partners are of opposite types. Once again, it is important to understand and recognize those differences and plan accordingly.

The introvert will require some quiet time, relaxing with a book or working on a home project alone. The extrovert will want to be more involved with others, serving on committees or attending sporting events.

As in any successful relationship, compromise becomes important, along with a willingness to allow each other time and space. In addition, joining with each other in preferred activities is an important component of those efforts to compromise.
