Victims often become violent

Youth victimization is not only threatening to the victim but also to U.S. society for another reason.

The experience of being victimized by crime has been found to increase certain people's inclinations for perpetrating violence, juvenile crime, adult criminality and adult violence toward family members. Reducing victimization of youth can therefore also reduce youth violence.

Black youth, along with recent Asian immigrants and gay, lesbian and bisexual youth also run a greater risk for being victims of violence stemming from "hate crimes." Rates of victimization for young Hispanics are slightly lower than those for black and higher than those for white youth.

The New York Times, Dec. 7, 1990 said, "In some areas of the country, it is now more likely for a black male between 15 and 25 to die from homicide than it was for a United States soldier to be killed on a tour of duty in Vietnam."

Regardless of race or cultural group, violence is most prevalent among the poor. Thus, although violence in nonurban areas is increasing, children in poor, unstable neighborhoods are more likely to be assaulted than their counterparts in affluent or stable suburbs.

The ultimate violence is murder. Homicide has been the leading cause of death among African Americans of ages 15-34 since 1978. The lifetime risk of violent death for young black males is one in 27 and for black females is one in 17. By contrast, one in 205 young white males and one in 496 white females are murdered.

Only a small percentage of youth join delinquent gangs, and relatively few gang members engage in violence. Nonetheless, in three out of four cases of murder and assault committed by youth, the perpetrators are likely to be gang members.

In the 1970s and 80s, gang violence increased substantially in both level and type of violence in the United States. Gangs now operate in all 50 states and in suburbia as well as the inner city.

A survey of 35 cities in 1989 reported a total of 1,439 gangs; the estimate today has leapt to about 2,000 gangs, with as many as 200,000 members.

Until the 1970s, most gang members were 12-21 years old; today they can be anywhere as young as nine or as old as 30. The younger and older gang members reflect the increase of gang involvement in drugs.

Male gang members outnumber females 15 to one, but the gender gap is slowly narrowing.

Today's gang violence is deadlier than in the 1950s, when "turf tiffs" were usually settled with switchblades or chains. Today, weapons of choice are AK-47s or Uzis, and drive-by shootings have replaced schoolyard rumbles.

After reviewing hundreds of research findings, three major national studies in three different decades have concluded that heavy exposure to televised violence is one of the significant causes of violence in society:

• The Surgeon General's Commission

Report (1972).

• The National Institute of Mental Health Ten-Year Follow-up (1982).

• The report of the American Psychological Association's Task Force on Television in Society (1992).

Viewing violence on the screen:

- Increases the viewer's fear of becoming a victim of violence, with a resultant increase in self-protective behaviors and increased mistrust of others.
- Desensitizes the viewer to violence, resulting in a callused attitude toward violence directed at others and a decreased likelihood of taking action to help a victim of violence.
- Increases the viewer's appetite for becoming involved with violence.
- Often demonstrates how desirable commodities can be obtained through the use of aggression and violence.

Sexual violence in X- and R-rated videotapes widely available to teenagers has also been shown to cause an increase in male aggression against females.

These effects are both short term and long lasting. A longitudinal study of boys found a significant relationship between exposure to television violence at 8 years of age and antisocial acts — including serious violent criminal offenses and spouse abuse — 22 years later.
