Cold nights signal end for those last tomatoes

Cold nights are here, hinting at frosts yet to come. If you have tomatoes, you may have some that are approaching maturity. Leave them on the vine until mature or until a frost is forecast.

Tomatoes will ripen off the vine if they reach a phase of maturity called the "mature green stage." These tomatoes are mature enough to harvest though not yet red. Look for full-sized tomatoes with a white, star-shaped zone at the bottom of the fruit.

When harvesting before a frost, separate the tomatoes into three groups for storage: those that are mostly red; those that are just starting to turn; and those that are still green. Discard any tomatoes with defects such as rot or breaks in the skin.

Place the tomatoes on cardboard trays or cartons. Use layers of newspaper to separate fruit if stacked. Occasionally, a tomato may start to rot and leak juice. The newspaper will keep the juice from contacting nearby fruit.

Store in a cool place, as close to 55 degrees as possible, until needed.
