Idea translates into passion, career

By Ron Wilson

Director of the Huck Boyd National Institute for Rural Development at Kansas State University

Can an idea translate into a career? In today's Kansas Profile, we'll learn about a case where an idea became a lifelong passion through translation - and I mean that literally. We'll meet a young woman based in rural Kansas who has become an international advocate of community foundations.

Svetlana Pushkareva Hutfles is executive director of the Kansas Association of Community Foundations. She has had a fascinating journey from Russia to rural Kansas, with community foundations as a common theme.

Svetlana is a native of Russia. When an American delegation came to her town to study the possibility of community foundations in Russia, she was asked to translate.

As she translated the words, she began to understand the meaning - and was fascinated by it. Community foundations were being used in the U.S. to receive local donations and bequests - endowed gifts - for the betterment of those communities, for good, forever.

"I became fascinated by how community foundations empowered people," Svetlana said. "It was a way for people to come together, help their communities, see results and seed permanent funds to support the community, instead of idly expecting the state or national bureaucracy to take care of all pressing needs." This was a radical change from the communist system - literally, a foreign concept.

"The word 'endowment' didn't exist in the Russian language," she said. She became interested and helped establish the first community foundation in Russia. She went on to assist community foundations in eastern and western Europe and beyond, while earning college degrees in Russia and the United Kingdom.

Meanwhile, she met and 12 years later married a U.S. Peace Corps volunteer. Flip Hutfles is an Illinois native, but his father's family came from Nemaha County, Kansas and he spent summers here as a child.

Flip worked in various states and did community development work overseas for the UN. After he and Svetlana got married, they moved to Kansas to be closer to his family and he became city administrator in Fredonia -- a rural town of 2,555 people. Now, that's rural.

Svetlana said, "I came from a city of 750,000 in Russia. I always thought I was from a small town until I came to Kansas."

In 2003, she flew into the Kansas City airport and thought to herself, 'What a cute, provincial town.' "Now when I go from Fredonia to Kansas City, I think, 'Wow, what a city.'"

What about coming to Kansas? "I happily, consciously and voluntarily chose Kansas over other options," Svetlana said. When asked what she likes about small town life, Svetlana said, "People do care. 'How are you doing?' is not just meaningless conversation. They embrace you. You have a sense of security and comfort, of knowing people, and of being part of a community."

So Svetlana came to Kansas and became the first paid executive director of a new statewide association of community foundations.

"Those who care about Kansas should talk to their financial advisers and community foundations about smart ways to ensure a bright future for Kansas. We should ask, 'What can I as an individual do?'" she said.

"It's our time to contribute back to Kansas as a way of thanking this land for the wealth and all the good we were able to enjoy in our lifetime here," Svetlana said. "Kansas is at a critical juncture in terms of its philanthropic potential. $66 billion will be transferred from one generation to the next in our state by 2020. We face an urgent need to capture a portion of the intergenerational transfer by endowing a portion of it at community foundations in Kansas before it follows the population out of Kansas forever. Otherwise, much of this wealth will be lost to federal estate taxes or to heirs residing outside the state of Kansas. We need to act now."

Can an idea translate into a career? Yes. Svetlana Pushkareva Hutfles is making a difference by translating her international knowledge of community foundations into a tremendous resource for Kansas. Fortunately, it gains a great deal in the translation. We'll learn more about how community foundations work in next week's Kansas Profile.
