The most amazing thing is that people even of the Atlantic coast have begun to find us on the map. And in this connection it is that Goodland has reached New York City by reputation, and the failings and the fame of the short grass country have appeared in the New York Sun.

Some mysterious wanderer on a journalistic mission doubtless passed this way and carried us away in his mind. The article, "Short Grass Picking Up," written from Goodland, was copied from the New York paper by the Denver Post in its issue of Oct. 27.

Among other things, the writer says: "A new era is coming to the short grass country. The high plains that make up western Kansas and western Nebraska and reach far down into the Panhandle are experiencing a development that means much for their future.

'Riding into Goodland from the north the driver called attention to the fact that we were near the village, which sits on a plain as level as a floor. Here and there is a binder running in a field of barley.

"Alfalfa is cut on the creek bottoms, corn are sown in these bottom lands and stacks of hay, cut where the blue stem has worked into low ground, are heaped up in preparation for the time of need.

"When a blizzard comes, the cattle can be rounded up near some of these feed supplies and their lives saved. Never again will the range know the old time losses. The clean, and entering the living room assigned a date.

cattlemen have learned that does not pay.

"Then there is the water supply question. One may reach water at a depth of twenty feet or of 200 depending on whether you start from a lowlying surface or from the top of a hill.

"On one ranch are forty five mills, and none of them have been able to lower the water in the pumps. Day and night they whirl, lifting steady streams to the surface for the thirsty cattle or to irrigate some tenant's garden.

"Strange are the meetings of the old and the new civilizations. Riding one evening up the Beaver creek road, we came on a sod house set amid a straggling group of cottonwoods that had once marked a

"The dwelling was neat and we saw on the wall that evidence of modern progressiveness — a telephone. Thirty two miles from a railroad, almost as far from a store, the family of the settler yet was in touch with the world. "The dwellers of the western prairies present a revelation in simplicity, good cheer, content and prosperity to one unfamiliar with the manifestations of that sort of western development. "They are working out their destiny under conditions and by methods that promise a continued success and mean permanence in the control of their possessions.'
